Bighouse Films is an independant film production company dedicated to raising the bar on traditional wedding videos. We are not videographers, we are real-life filmmakers committed to working with you to produce a unique and artistic vision to capture and remember and your special day.

- Easy to understand price packages to fit all budgets
- State of the art production and post production equipment
- Professionally authored DVD's with multiple chapters

Serial Dater

"I love you, sweetheart" is a bad breakup strategy. You came into my life and pursued me with persistence. You called incessantly and in time broke my walls down. I trusted you, I believed you. I now understand why the last person you were involved with is having such difficulty letting go. I should have left the morning they came to your door. Most people don't throw I-love-yous, loads of attention and generosity around lightly. In the end I hope you get your wish, that of "trying to figure out if I can be alone" because that is what you deserve.

The Sexiest Dental Receptionist Around

I know that I said that I would stop asking you out. I have stopped, but every time I see you, especially that smile, it drives me nuts. I respected the fact that you were "kinda seeing someone" and took what I could get with the lunch dates as "friends." But now you have broken up with him and are "kinda seeing" someone new. I never even got my chance. I said that being friends was cool, but I lied. You are so beautiful, sweet and we have so much in common and you know it. Every time I came up to sit in that chair, knowing that a world of pain was coming my way, I would forget all about it when I saw you behind that desk. What does a guy have to do? Remember that "sweet" gesture from me on Valentine's Day last year? I am capable of even more romance than that, even though you think I'm just some bad boy from Eastie. I'm almost done with the visits and I won't see you that often anymore. Give me that one chance I never got. I would treat you right, I promise girl.

South on 93

I first saw you when I went the wrong way on 93 and had to make a U-turn to get back onto 93 South in New Hampshire. I caught up to you on the highway and I didn't want to have to get back off the highway at Andover. You were driving a blue pick-up. You passed, I passed and you waved when I had to go. Were you heading back toward Boston? I'm hoping you live a little closer to the city, a little closer to home for me. If you can tell me what I was driving, maybe what I looked like, I might be willing to swing by and pick you up for a drink.

Feb. 8 at Attitash

It was about 2:30 pm and I was taking off my boots in Rental Return. You have reddish hair, you looked very cold and very cute because you had just taken your last run of the day from the summit. You started chatting with me about skiing and how it's a crime that I haven't hiked Mount Washington. You're from Swansea and were hoping there was a Budweiser promotion that weekend. I was the cute brunette with the dark blue coat who was there with the Genesis Fund. You called me sweetie as you left and I should've given you my number. Tell me where I'm from and I'll tell you where to find me.

Busk Stop

Feb. 1: I was taking the Red Line and you were playing guitar on the middle platform. I was with my friends on the left platform. It was a long wait for my train. While you were trying to think of a song to play, I requested Janis Joplin's "Bobby McGee." It really was said just as a joke to my friends but you said something like, "It's not in my range." That caught my attention. You were a trooper and you played a bit of it. I told you that it was my birthday, which was a fib. You of course said, "Is it really?" (I guess you've heard of women telling people that it's their birthday when it's not, just to get free drinks and other stuff.) You asked my name and I said "Melissa" because I don't yell out my real name on a subway (but I would be glad to tell you my real name). My friend told you that I was 22 (not a lie). You sang "Happy Birthday" for me and had everyone there sing to me. But what got me was when you then sang it in another language (très cool) and then came up with a funny song to the "Happy Birthday" tune quickly. It was about how I would go to the Purple Shamrock and drink tequila shots off of a guy. It was really funny and had a plot. Unfortunately some of the lyrics I couldn't hear because the train came, but luckily the train doors open for the middle platform as well. Under my friend's encouragement I went up and kissed you on the cheeks. I wish I had a pen and paper to give you my number, because you were quite fetching when I got up closer. If I were on Love Connection I'd give you another date—that is, if we can have a first. In Janis Joplin's words, "Come on and take it, take another bit of my heart now baby."

Chris?

I met someone who stopped me in my tracks in Killington, Vt., at the Pickle Barrel happy hour Feb. 7. She lives in Beacon Hill and I think she might be a teacher (unless she was kidding when she told me that). We only spoke for a few minutes but she made an impression—so much so that I've asked all my friends if they know her and one suggested trying this. Like an idiot I didn't think to ask for her number until right after she left (rookie move, learn from my mistakes all). If you know her, please forward this to her and have her contact me. If it's really her I'll know because she'll be able to tell me what I asked her when we met that surprised her, what she and her friend were drinking, what they were wearing, and what grade she told me she teaches, etc. Whoever gets this to her I'll owe big time! Thanks for the help!

V-Day

We met last year on Valentine's Day and for a while it was wonderful. Even though exams, time and pride have gotten in the way of us, I still think about you. Send me an e-mail if you still think about me!

It All Adds Up

We met 12 years ago, dated, and then went our own ways because we could never seem to get it right. Back then you were a young, hot lad and I was a shy, hot girl. I used to follow you home from work and make you really nervous when we would leave our jobs. You used to be able to tell me apart from any other customer who strode through the door because of my perfume. Years have passed and I never thought that I would see you again. Then I ran into you at the lake in Wakefield one night in July and I swear our eyes made contact, but neither one of us approached the other. I then saw you at a Dunkin' Donuts in Stoneham on Jan 2. We talked and hugged there very briefly and you told me that you moved and were now my neighbor. We have run into each other intermittently since that Friday night, and I want to ask you why people find the one true thing and throw it back for something brighter or better? You threw me away for someone better and I just let you go. If the right person is reading this, you are a tall dirty-blond/light-brown-haired, blue-eyed, 30-year-old male in the accounting profession. rockie horoscope

MARCH 3 – 16, 2004

BY ROCKIE GARDINER

PISCES FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

So I lied, but only to protect you. If the last couple of weeks were dominated by disturbing events and explosive reactions, you probably were celebrating a birthday. February Fish would have caught the worst of it when the sun joined erratic Uranus. Now you may turn quite conscientious and contrite because the sun supports Saturn; a bit of a downer, but constructive. Anticipate the swing to manic as enthusiastic Jupiter magnifies the brilliant Pisces sun–Mercury conjunction on the 3rd. Maybe you'll get lucky, published or married?

ARIES

MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Jubilant, generous Jupiter favoring your Mars ruler provides more enthusiasm and confidence than even a shy, retiring Ram—if there is such an animal—could possibly use. With impulsive Mars in your Taurus money house, the urge to spend, especially for romantic fun and games or other risky ventures, will be hard to contain. Add the attention and approval you're enjoying while magnetic Venus is in Aries (but only until March 5), and you might assume that you can do no wrong. Well, not until a respected colleague suggests otherwise.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

The intensity of your desire increases whenever your Venus ruler aligns with powerful Pluto, planted firmly in your house of sex, secrets and other people's money. The stronger you feel about, say, a family heirloom or a handsome hunk's family jewels, the more you have to have it. But instead of leading to disaster, this supportive relationship rewards an ever-changing value system. It also makes it easier to give up something or someone else. You won't be sitting this pretty again until autumn, so choose wisely and well.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

This is another of those super-smart periods when your Mercury ruler floods your brain with intelligence, imagination and, for a welcome change, prudence. First, you get the brainstorm; then, you realize its practical applications; and finally, as the idealistic Pisces sun and expansive Jupiter zap the Messenger, you foresee its future potential. The Virgo full moon on the 6th may present the career opportunity that can turn another good idea into a full-fledged reality. Meanwhile, a casual friend gets chummy.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

To boldly go… A woman may be the reason you're given the chance to blaze a trail you normally wouldn't stumble across yourself. There's nothing especially hazardous about this venture; you're behaving responsibly and just might contain your Cancerian concern for troubled souls. There's also the lure of not-so-filthy lucre as this full moon lands on your financial axis, currently housing generous Jupiter, the eternal optimist, and Mercury, the curious communicator. Without half-trying, you could become much smarter, and richer, than you were last week.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Pay more attention to the small stuff. While your sun ruler and Mercury meet in Pisces, random thoughts floating through your mind, idle chatter or something you read can have a significant impact on future plans. But don't expect to get a crystal-clear image or a fully realized idea. In Pisces, this planetary merger leads to diffusion, illusion and sacrifice. A word of warning: Since the sun also opposes generous Jupiter in Virgo, good intentions may fall victim to boundless enthusiasm, unrealistic expectations, inflated costs and egos.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

This could be a seesaw sort of time, with very high highs possible as your Mercury ruler and the Pisces sun face benevolent Jupiter in your sign. Someone may promise you the moon and vice versa. The low point comes if and when this person makes a grab for the goodies, retracts an offer or otherwise proves a disappointment. However, you'll wind up so much wiser than before, and after Jupiter goes direct, wealthier as well. Just remember, until Mercury moves into Aries on the 12th you may be far too willing to suspend disbelief. Romantic foolishness!

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Whose allegiance can you count on now? Who has your best interests at heart: a playmate, offspring or colleague? A battle among them isn't a sure thing, but you might become conflicted by too many divergent opinions. Besides, while your Venus ruler travels through bold, brave Aries, you'll tend to go it alone. That, for a Libra, is somewhat out of character. Until Venus arrives in Taurus and opts for a sensual, secure alternative, try to be more patient, primarily with yourself.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Simpatico, sexy and solvent, too? Your everyday routine—a trip to the health food store, a visit to the vet, a brief encounter at work—can bring rewards you couldn't possibly expect. Thanks to affectionate Venus courting your Pluto co-ruler, you'll be able to maximize the benefits—material, social and otherwise—due you. Just be sure that you don't insist on having it all your way; there's a crucial compromise in the offing by midmonth. Better to have some satisfaction and money than risk everything on attitude.

SAGITTARIUS

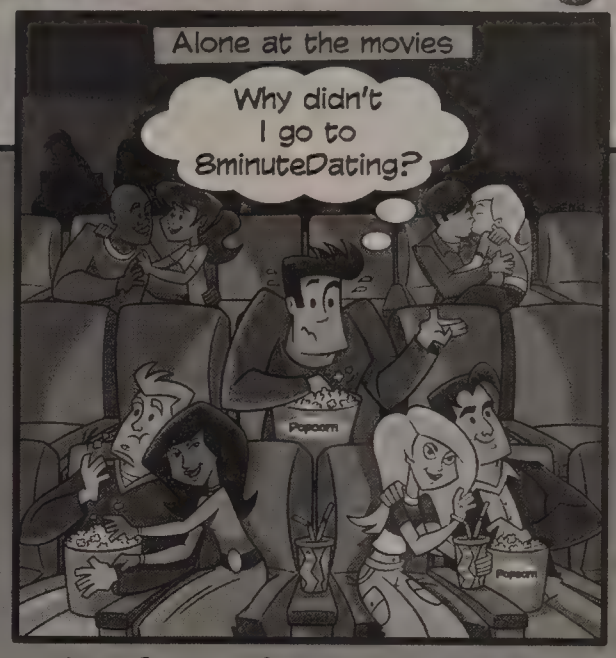
NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Pressured by a family situation, a career demand or blind ambition to once again overextend, the sagacious Sag should try to hold back a bit. But which Centaur among us follows another's advice? You could also anticipate a short trip, a run-in with a neighbor, maybe a conflict between hoping to be charitable and having to be practical. Because this is a particularly fertile period for romance and creative ventures, it wouldn't hurt to pay more attention to your love life, a child and your OB-GYN.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

During this full moon period, money matters can have a stronger effect on Caps born in mid January. For the others, the Pisces-Virgo dichotomy could bring about a fascinating excursion into how your mind works, a detailed research project or an actual trip. Communicating to the best of your ability, no matter if the medium is poetry or physics, results from the intellectual stimulus you're currently receiving. But if you're hearing complaints from a female in the family, wait a week and they'll be gone.



AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

It's not a woman but a macho man who may be giving you grief. If assertive Mars is attacking with a variety of motivational techniques, e.g., badgering and bullying, either hire a guy to do the dirty work or dig in yourself. Mars in earthy Taurus is determined, security-conscious and practical, so when artistic Venus arrives, the groundwork for the aesthetic improvements she'll bring will already be laid. This full moon can affect your opinion, pro or con, about a financial matter a partner advocates.

it's a SHORE thing

The Improper Bostonian's Shores of Boston issue is sure to please. We will take a look at perfect day trips to Boston's North and South shores and tell you what to do, where to eat, shop and hang out when you get there. Did you ever wonder how the shores compare? Consult our handy-dandy chart on who's got the most celebrities, the best beaches and the tastiest seafood. Speaking of seafood, in 1916, Lawrence Woodman dipped a shucked clam in batter and threw it into the deep fryer, creating the first fried clam. In this issue, Julie Suratt visits Woodman's restaurant on the North Shore and highlights it as the quintessential New England clam shack. Then she returns to Boston and compares the decor, food and view at Woodman's with that of six seafood shanties in Boston. Finally if you like your fried clams with a side of salsa, you will enjoy the Improper's guide to dance classes in Boston—you'll find out where to learn everything from the cha-cha to the tango.

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

At the Mardi Gras Date Auction, top: John Macuga and Vincenzo DiMaio. Middle row: Allyson Correia, Courtney Driscoll and Jennifer Macauley; Sarah Graham and Erik Pelletier. Bottom: Aaron Maass

HOW MUCH IS THAT HOTTIE ON THE CATWALK?

Who knew that a night of heavy drinking could actually benefit the American Liver Foundation (aside from simply keeping it in business)? Yet it did, when seven members of the Run for Research team, who run in the Boston Marathon to raise money for the ALF, held the fourth annual Mardi Gras Date Auction at the Big Easy.

Among the brave souls willing to put themselves on the block for a worthy cause were model and qualified marathoner Sarah Graham (who hoped she'd fetch "at least $700"); human resources cutie Courtney Driscoll and her roommate, registered nurse Allyson Correia (who predicted, with a facetious grin, that they'd go for "huge money"); travel business babe Jennifer Macauley (who tossed out Hershey's kisses to incite a bidding war); policy analyst John Macuga (who said hopefully, "there's some big-spendin' ladies here tonight"); tech consultant and tall drink of water Erik Pelletier ("I'm gonna raise a million bucks"); and sharp-dressed man Vincenzo DiMaio ("the sky's the limit").

As it turned out, Pelletier set a record, bringing in $1,100, while Graham earned the biggest bucks ($850) among the women. Everyone else did respectably (most fetching more than they predicted), and one unscheduled pair of bachelorettes even netted $1,200.

Meanwhile, there was the amusing irony (given the evening's cause) that to ease their jitters, a few of the participants fortified their egos with alcohol, imbibing freely. In fact, one pair of bachelorettes got so drunk that the organizers were worried about letting them go onstage. But even they behaved impeccably, and the evening went off without a hitch. (Combined with a silent auction of items like a one-week stay in Breckenridge, Colo., and a day of flying on a private plane, the event raised $10,000 more than it did last year.)

With all the high spirits—not to mention enough beads to sink a parade float—it was a fair approximation of Fat Tuesday in New Orleans, minus all the college students and rednecks shouting, "Show us your tits!"

WATCH WHAT YOU'RE WEARING...

Scantily clad revelers sporting little more than feathers and body paint, shakin' their money-makers to a samba beat. A parade, complete with musicians, drummers, a float, and giant puppets on stilts. Sounds like Rio de Janeiro, right?

Well, not quite.

In fact, it was ClimActs!—a bacchanalian, carnival-themed fund-raiser for the Theater Offensive that raised the roof on the Cyclorama at the Boston Center for the Arts.

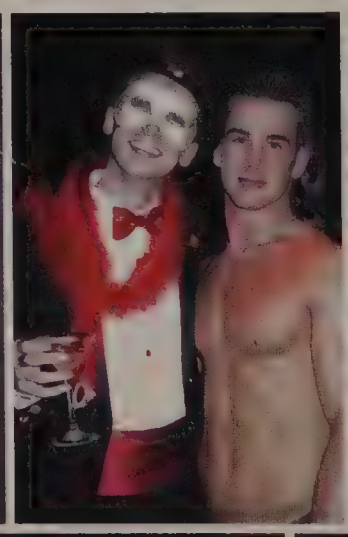
Guests at the VIP reception sipped drinks slung by bartenders from Buzz, while a pair of well-oiled go-go boys gyrated in their G-strings atop platforms in the middle of the room. Then it was time for an indoor parade that led the guests into the main party area, where a live auction—including such risque, outre and outlandish items as a chance to serve as a "fluffer" on a porn film—ensued.

Prominent among the throng: actor Peter Paige of Queer As Folk; Pulitzer Prize–winning playwright Paula Vogel; drag icon/filmmaker Charles Busch; the Theater Offensive's fairy godfather, Abe Rybeck; Cambridge socialite Joan Parker; the American Repertory Theatre's Gideon Lester and Jan Geidt; the Commonwealth Shakespeare Company's Steven Maler and his other half, Tony Liquori; white-hot interior designers Eileen Patterson, Ken Dietz and Dennis Duffy; studly tie designer Tony Corey; art dealer Bernie Toale and his de facto husband-type person, Coolidge Corner Theatre impresario Joe Zina; fund-raising guru Bradley Seeman and the dashing Sahil Mehta; perpetual party machine Harry Collings; incorrigible scamp Peter Nee; cutie-pie couple Chris Horan and David Connelly; real estate mack-daddy David Whitman, and so on and so forth down the list of so-called "A-gays" and fringe-theater fans.

This being an evening with an unmistakably homo skew, there was no dearth of comments worthy of Carson on Queer Eye for the Straight Guy: for instance, the guest who coyly responded to a compliment on his white tie and tails by saying, "What? This old thing?" Meanwhile, the award for bitchiest fashion critique went to the guy who looked at a friend's outfit and said, "The invitation said carnival, not funeral." IB



At the Cyclorama, clockwise from top: Abe Rybeck; the float; Chris Hornan and David Connelly; Gideon Lester and Jan Geidt; Kevin Pierce, Petra Yeicholz, Ed Walsh and David Whitman; Sahil Mehta and Bradley Seeman; Chris Horan and a go-go boy; a dancer

IDOL MATTERS

The last time Jamaica Plain native Joey McIntyre graced our cover, two years ago, I received e-mails from women—and a few men—not only in Boston but around the world requesting copies of the issue. This time, we've got five pages of fashion and an interview with the former New Kid on the Block, who's about to release a new album. So it's a given that by the time you read this, the fan network will have done its job, my e-mail inbox will again be stuffed with requests, and we'll be prepping packages to Finland and Brazil.

Teen crushes and dreamy photos aside, this issue has practical advice for enriching your real life too. In our main feature (page 18), we offer three itineraries to help you explore those nearby but underappreciated North and South shores. From diners where the locals eat to hidden overlooks and one-of-a-kind boutiques, we point out the spots that make for a perfect day trip.

If all you really want is a plate of fried seafood served like they do at a shore clamshack (i.e., no frills), Boston has some pretty decent facsimiles. Julie Suratt shows you where to go in and around the city (page 24).

GEN X VS. GEN Y

Where in the hell did you find the vacuous twits who were quoted in the "Females Answer Questions" article (March 3)? I'm not referring to all of the women quoted, of course, but a couple of them (read: Caroline and Jess) made me cringe. As a woman, I feel misrepresented! Caroline's litany of dating deal-breakers was nothing short of ridiculous. We're not all such petty, judgmental, high-maintenance witches, boys, I assure you! And another thing: Just because a person drinks on nights other than the sorority girl–sanctioned weekend ones does not make her an alcoholic. As for Jess, I didn't appreciate her estimation that "75 percent of all women are insane on some level." Speak for yourself, sister! You're supposed to be on our side!

Maybe Caroline and Jess are just too damn young too get it. I found that the older women quoted had the most accurate, interesting things to say. Perhaps next time the vapid twentysomethings should bow out of the Q&A session and go back to slurping their apple martinis in cheesy college bars.

GOOD "LORD"

Well, now: Eleven Academy Awards (including Best Picture and Director). Four Golden Globes (including Best Drama and Director). Over $1 billion at the box office worldwide. Overwhelmingly positive critical response (awards from the New York critics' group and others, plus a 96 percent favorable rating on Rotten Tomatoes.com).

So, one last time—Paul Sherman, you're wrong about The Lord of the Rings. Congratulations on the hat trick!

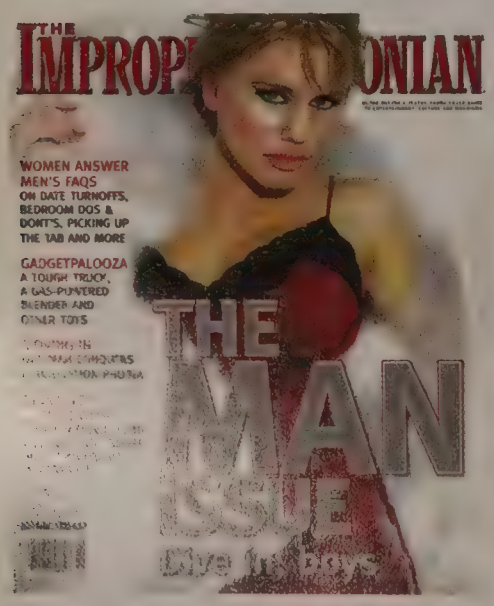
'BOUT 'MAGINE!



Ezra's piece on the urbanization of a "native" (March 3) was wicked. I, too, am a Mainer moonlighting as a Bostonian. If they ever come to revoke my Mainer card, I'll fight to the death with these Maine truths: I will always travel up to Boston and down to Bah Hahbah; lobster tastes better sitting off the tailgate of a truck; and, no, you can't get theyah from heyah.

CORRECTIONS

In the March 3 Last Scene Here, the picture identified as Aaron Maass is Harry Collings. Also in that issue, credit for the hairstyling in the men's fashion feature goes to William George for James Joseph Salon.

The correct phone number for Anthem, reviewed in the Feb. 18 issue, is 617-523-8383.

WHERE IN THE HELL DID YOU FIND THE VACUOUS TWITS QUOTED IN THE "FEMALES ANSWER QUESTIONS" ARTICLE? AS A WOMAN, I FEEL MISREPRESENTED!

DEAR MR. BELVEDERE

When Dan McMyler, owner of the tapas restaurant Tasca in Brighton, opened Belvedere in the North End, he had no intention of creating yet another eatery in a space that's been a revolving door for restaurants for years. (Café Ravello was the latest to fade away.)

Instead, McMyler has created a casual pub on the first floor, offering soups and sandwiches. An upscale lounge—something he felt was lacking in the North End—serves Mediterranean tapas and housemade desserts on the second floor. So far, North Enders have responded enthusiastically. The bar is busy from its 4 pm opening time, when it caters to the after-work crowd, until last call at 1 am, when the place is filled with twentysomethings out for one last drink. That's the draw of Belvedere. You'll find buff Big Dig workers quaffing frosty PBRs next to North End neo-yuppies sipping lemon droptinis.

And now that the eyesore of the I-93 overpass has been dismantled, you can't beat Belvedere's view. As you you take in the Boston skyline, try some tapas, like sirloin meatballs in a portabello mushroom sauce ($5), grilled skewers of chicken and chorizo in a roasted-chili sauce ($6), or the spinach and Parmesan tartlet ($4). All the prices are extremely reasonable. "We're trying to keep everything under $8," says manager Jack Lynch.

In early April, Belvedere will add comfort food to the menu, including pressed sandwiches and entrées like franks and beans, meatloaf and fish cakes—"the sort of food you can't get anywhere else in the North End," says Lynch. 50 Salem St., Boston (617-367-6444). —Erin Hagedorn and Julie Suratt

QUITE A PROJECT...

Red Sox fans looking for yet another way to indulge their obsession should check out Bill Nowlin and Cecilia Tan's new book, The Fenway Project, which chronicles the Sox' June 28, 2002, game against the Atlanta Braves from the perspectives of 61 different fans located in and around the ballpark. The Fenway Project's observers follow the game from inside the scoreboard (as pictured at right), atop the roof (where one proposed to his girlfriend), in the computer control room, the press box, the owner's box, the far reaches of the bleachers and even the locker room (where it is revealed that there is a urinal in the alley that leads from the dugout to the locker room, just out of sight of the TV cameras). However, perhaps the most familiar perspective, given Fenway's perpetually sold-out status, is that of Denis Repp, who follows the game from the bars surrounding the park. Go to www.rounderbooks.com to order a copy of the book—unlike tickets to any of the Sox/Yankees games, there ought to be a few available. —Ezra Dyer

PSYCHIC ROSS MILLER

Ever wonder about those little flashes of light in the corner of your eye? Or where your other-worldly affinity for Taco Bell comes from? According to Newton psychic medium, healer and regression therapist Ross Miller, the light flashes are your guardian angels, not symptoms of premature glaucoma. As for the tacos, you might have been a conquistador in a previous life. While it might sound like a load of bull pucky, Miller's been identifying past lives and introducing clients to their guardian angels for years. We're not sure if he has a crystal ball, but he's probably one of the few mediums to hold a degree from the prestigious Wharton business school. Does that make him legit? You can decide for yourself at his psychic development and angel communication workshop, at his office (1075 Washington St., Newton) March 27. Here he chats about life in the mystic realm.

IB: What line of work were you in before you started this business?
RM: Most recently I was a stockbroker. I decided to do this full-time about 10 years ago when they started doing psychic readings on TV, and I realized people were ready for this and becoming more aware of it.
IB: How does your business-school background figure into your spiritual and healing life?
RM: It has nothing to do with my spiritual work. When I was first learning to regress and heal myself, I had to unlearn most of the things I was taught in business school in order to accept some of the universal concepts I was learning about. At times it was a hindrance rather than a help. But as far as my business goes, it helps me with marketing and advertising.
IB: How did you become a healer and medium?
RM: After I graduated from business school, I had a clairvoyant dream during [which] I kept hearing [the words], "You are a true seer." Once I awoke, I figured if I was supposed to be a seer, I better find out what a seer is and does. So I started studying with various psychic mediums and healers.
IB: How many past lives have you had, and what's one of the more interesting?
RM: I've had more than 400 lives. I had a series of dreams where I'd be ducking behind trees with bullets whizzing behind me. By the look of things, it must've been around 1917 and I got the feeling I was in Russia. I regressed myself back to that lifetime and saw that I had been a writer and revolutionary trying to overthrow Czar Nicholas II and was subsequently caught and shot by his firing squad. Years later, I had a client who started channeling the spirit of Rasputin. He came through my client and asked me to forgive him for ordering my execution.
IB: Is there any way to tell, or can you have any control over, what you'll be in the next lifetime?
RM: You actually choose what you're going to be, your economic circumstances, who your family members will be, who your spouse will be, between lifetimes. Typically what happens is that when you make the transition at death back into spirit, you go through the tunnel into white light. Then you have a quick life review where you see what you need to work on next time. After you join up with your soul group, or group of souls that you typically reincarnate with, you plan out your next life and how you're going to learn your various lessons. Then you begin reincarnating in another body.
IB: What is a guardian angel?
RM: Everyone has several angels and spirit guides that work with them. They're actually neuter, and they look like little balls of light. They're energy fields, and they sometimes appear in aura photographs. They're usually by our side helping us learn our lessons and follow our chosen paths.
IB: OK. Now onto the important question: Will I marry Adam Brody, aka Seth from The O.C.?
RM: No Adam for you. I'm sorry.
—Jessica Iredale

BACK TO THE BRISTOL

The Season Is upon Us... Much to the delight of business bigwigs, ladies who lunch and AmEx cardholders everywhere, the Bristol Lounge is again open after a two-month respite for renovations. Regulars can expect to see a refreshed interior with expanded bar seating and new colors, furniture and fixtures, plus the debut of the $32 power breakfast. Of course, not everything needed revamping. The classic eight-ounce Bristol Burger is still available for a juicy $18. 200 Boylston St. (617-338-4400).

Salubrious Seas... New from the ecologically friendly fishing activists at EcoFish are celebrity chef sustainable-seafood entrées (say that five times fast). High-profile members of the Chefs Collaborative—a network of more than 1,000 foodies—have created kits that feature only products harvested from environmentally conscious fisheries. Colorful boxes include two servings of fish, an original spice rub or marinade, and simple instructions on how to create the dish in 10 minutes or less. Ana Sortun of Oleana and Stan Frankenthaler, formerly of Salamander, are among the chefs who've contributed entrées. Sortun's California squid rings and crispy calamari kit and Frankenthaler's Chinese bay scallops retail for about $8 each at Wild Oats. Wild Oats, 2151 Mystic Valley Parkway, Medford (781-395-4998).

Table for Two... Pay attention, boys. Want to impress your lady with a romantic, home-cooked meal, but suffer from sub-par cooking skills? Dorchester chef Abdus Shakur solves the problem with his three-month-old catering service, DiningForTwo.net. You supply the home, Shakur supplies the cookin'—four courses' worth. The Web site provides complete info, but here's the short of it: You fill out an online request for a date and time and meet with Shakur to personalize the details (special occasion, surprise, etc.). He brings the food to your home, cooks and serves it course-by-course. The client is asked only to dress for a fine dining experience and supply a stove and one shelf in the refrigerator. The service is $350, and for an additional cost, Shakur can provide wine pairing, a harpist or violinist, or a massage therapist. (617-740-8582). www.diningfortwo.net.

Mini Me...FYI, if you're looking for trendy buzz in a can, Red Bull is, like, so five minutes ago. The latest aluminum-clad elixir—this one with alcohol instead of caffeine—comes from none other than Hollywood don Francis Ford Coppola. The proud papa premiered Sofia Mini, an individual-sized version of his Sofia Blanc de Blancs Sparkling Wine (named after his Oscar-winning daughter), March 1. L at Louis Boston is the sole Boston purveyor of the champagne-esque drink, which is served in a bright pink 187-milliliter can equipped with its own straw (to avoid lipstick smearage). Apparently sparkling wine (especially at $8 a can) isn't just for grandmothers and teenagers drinking in the bushes. —E.H., J.I. and J.S.

PRIZE POCKET BOOKS

While hanging out in the Enormous Room one night, I spotted a stunning, brightly colored bag from across the room and inquired where I could get one. The cute young girl carrying it smiled and said, "I make them." She was only making them for herself and friends. I quickly buddied up to her so I could snag one for myself—to no avail. A year later, I received in the mail a small catalog with a picture that looked an awful lot like the bag I had pined for. Sure enough, Jessica Moss has gone into the handbag business. Unlike many of her competitors, all of her bags are originals because she hand sews them (most people sketch their designs and have a manufacturing company make them). Patterns range from bright polka dots and plaids to little dancing monkeys. I just love the unique shapes she fashions them in. Bags range from $72-$137. www.jessicamoss.com. —Samantha Glouse

COUNTING CARBS?

The sun is finally ready to make an appearance, and the swimsuit you stuffed in the bottom drawer looks...small. Suddenly, the low-carb diet sounds like it might not be that bad. Luckily, lots of local chains and restaurants are getting in on the low-carb craze, which just might help you on your way to bathing-suit bliss. Here's a sampling:

✻Grill 23 & Bar: With steaks à la carte and plenty of vegetable side dishes, it's a candy store for carb counters. Executive chef Jay Murray creates at least one weekly signature special that's low in carbs, like the surf and turf—a five-ounce filet mignon with pan-roasted shrimp, ginger-butternut hash and rosemary-scented sauce. ($34). 161 Berkeley St., Boston (617-542-2255).

✻The Wrap: The Wrap has always made an effort to be low fat and low calorie. Now it offers a fajita wrap, made with a low-carb wheat tortilla ($5). You can also get a wrap minus the wrap itself—all the fillings in a bowl. Various locations.

✻T.G.I. Friday's: The menu is the size of a novel, and thanks to a partnership with Atkins Nutritionals, there really is something for everyone. Check out the cheeseburger cheeseburger: two patties with American cheese—no ketchup, no bun. ($7.59). 26 Exeter St., Boston (617-266-9040).

✻Subway: It seems that Subway spokesguy Jared's battle of the bulge was a marketing success. Subway recently teamed up with Atkins to offer official Atkins-approved menu items, including the chicken, bacon and ranch dressing wrap ($4.75). Various locations.

✻Mr. and Mrs. Bartley's Burger Cottage: The Atkins Burger is a bunless bacon cheeseburger with extra bacon, extra cheese, lettuce, tomato and tabouli. ($8.99). 1246 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-354-6559).

✻Jacob Wirth: While not guaranteed, the chefs try to feature a nightly low-carb-friendly special like the grilled Kobe beef burger with charred red onion, wild mushrooms, sautéed peppers and 7.5 net carbs. ($13). 31–37 Stuart St., Boston (617-338-8586). —Lauren Vane

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

Song Birds... One of the more intriguing (if not downright inexplicable) boutiques to pop up on our radar is the new Song store in the Prudential Mall. The experiential complement to the discount airline (which offers service between Boston and several Florida cities, as well as Las Vegas) showcases the airline's trippy, retro, '60s-inspired colors (think lime green and citrus orange) in displays that mimic a cross-section of one of the airline's fleet of plasma-screen equipped departure lounge. Shoppers can preview the in-flight entertainment and check out the kicky designs that Kate Spade came up with for the airline's uniforms. Song is pushing its new concept as an experience, rather than a retail store. So if you're looking to buy, selection is limited: The only things for sale are the flights.

Fashion Bug... Affordable isn't the most apt way to describe Newbury Street, especially when it comes to jewelry shopping. That makes Firefly Jewelry & Gifts a unique addition to the boutique promenade. Owner and former buyer at Filene's Marty Checkoway stocks a broad assortment of semi-precious jewelry, designer handbags, scarves and decorative ceramics ranging between $20 and $300. So far, the Van Glow ($35) glass suncatchers and stretchy Swarovski crystal rings ($24) are a hit with shoppers. 270 Newbury St., Boston (617-375-5885).

Social Hour... As if the IMPROPER weren't enough, there's another media outlet focusing on the dining, arts and nightlife beat. Marisa D'Vari, of Deg.com Communications, is unleashing Boston Social, a live, half-hour tour of local "food, fun and fashion," on Boston Neighborhood Network TV, March 18 at 9 pm. You might recognize D'Vari from her previous show, A Taste of Luxury, in which the social butterfly traveled the world interviewing celebrity chefs. "I realized we had the best chefs in Boston," she says. "So I changed the focus." In the coming months, Boston Social guests will include Legal Sea Foods owner Roger Berkowitz, Steve DiFillippo of Davio's and Christopher Myers and Michael Schlow of Radius.

Out of Africa... Attorney Elizabeth Plitzuweit was so moved by the art, fabrics and crafts she saw in her travels to Morocco that she turned selling them into a full-time career. Her shop, Gazala (the name is a loose translation of the Arabic word for gazelle), opened in November in the South End. "In Morocco, 'la gazelle' is a term of affection," says Plitzuweit, "and it became a funny joke to see how many people would call us that while we were there." Exotic imports from Marrakech, Fez and Rabat include hand-painted ceramics for $4, as well as pricier items like Berber rugs, patchwork pillow cases and an intricately designed silver and camel bone door for $7,500. 256 Shawmut Ave., Boston (617-426-6466). www.gazala-art.com.

Help Wanted...Apprentice fever is running rampant all over the city. Thanks to Donald Trump's reality series on NBC, "You're fired!" is the catch phrase of the season, and people are lining up for the chance to hear those two little words. This week, nightlife nabob Patrick Lyons plays the part of "The Donald" on KISS 108's Matty in the Morning show. Three men and three women are vying for a Lyons Group apprenticeship through a series of daily challenges, after which someone gets the boot. The contestant who proves the most savvy wins a month-long stint within the Lyons Group and $1,000 to boot. Morning show producer Lisa Roach says the candidates were pretty impressive. Apparently plenty of lawyers and Ivy League grads were willing to put their cushy jobs on hold to submit to the whims of "The Patrick." Meanwhile across town, NBC is hosting an open casting call for The Apprentice II at the Rack, March 20, from 10 am-5 pm. Be prepared for some intense cross-examination by casting execs.

YOU'RE SO VEIN

Sit down, young 'uns, and let grandpa tell you about his varicose vein.

There I was at the gym, grunting my way through a set of curls—the temple requires basic upkeep, you know—when something I saw in the mirror distracted me. No, it wasn't a guy excavating a mean spandex wedge while adjusting the spaghetti straps on his 'beater, although the beaterus spandexicus species is indigenous to my gym's meatosystem. There, in my left leg, was a bulging vein that was so big I wondered if I might have to get it its own membership. Being an amateur hypochondriac, I concluded that I was on the verge of having an embolism, and so immediately made an appointment with my doctor to find out what an embolism is, and whether it involves big disgusting leg veins.

When I showed my doc the grotesque vessel, he nonchalantly told me that all I had was a run-of-the-mill varicose vein. He didn't seem too worried about it, which made one of us. You see, I've always associated varicose veins with old ladies. A varicose vein isn't exactly the hot accessory for a happy-go-lucky young buck like myself. I envisioned myself wearing shorts in the summer, my varicose vein throbbing away in all its blue glory. What if I were playing Golden Tee at a bar or throwing a Frisbee in the park and people kept saying things like, "I hope I'm still that active at his age."

"How can I get rid of this thing?" I asked my doctor. "The varicose vein bus showed up at this stop about 30 years too early."

"Well, it's harmless, but if it's bothering you, the procedure to get rid of it is quite simple: We make an incision and rip out the entire vein."

Whoa, doc. Back up. Maybe you haven't been reading your New England Journal of Medicine, but these days many surgeries can be performed noninvasively using tiny cameras inside your body. The entire human genome has been mapped. Your vision can be fixed with frickin' lasers. And the treatment for varicose veins is to rip them out? I'd imagined a tiny robot going in my vein, painlessly deflating it with a laser, then dissolving into my bloodstream when it was done. This de-veining procedure sounded like it was straight out of the age of medicine where the treatment for a migraine was to saw off the top of your head and pour arsenic on your brain.

Also, I'm no doctor, but don't you need veins? I'm pale enough as it is. All I want is people saying, "Gee, Ez, your left leg is looking mighty pallid these days," and me having to reply, "That's because I had all my veins removed."

So I decided I was stuck with it, just me and My Cousin Veiny, BFF. But then I got an e-mail from my friend Braxton mentioning that he was laid up because he just had a bunch of veins removed from one of his legs. Now the case was open again. If Braxton "Hard as a Baby's Fingernails" Williams could do it, so could I, maybe. I asked him to tell me exactly how bad this ordeal was and what it entailed. "Basically I took a week off from work," he said. "You get all drugged up and limp around a lot. I'd say the only drawback, aside from the fact that surgery is generally something to avoid, is that you feel like a little bitch when you tell hot chicks you have varicose veins. If I had a dime for every time a person I wanted to sleep with told me she thought only old ladies got varicose veins, I'd be one rich pimp."

Hmmm. Well, my secret's already out, so that's not a problem. And you get drugs, which is nice. But what about the social implications? "Tomorrow I'm going to reenter the social scene like Ron Jeremy," Braxton wrote. "Straight up, I'm gonna be lacin' undergrads with wads of dubs and hittin' that tang when they see the mill in my grill. But seriously (as if I wasn't dead serious about that last comment), I plan on playing up my limp big-time. Sympathy makeout? Yes, please."

A VARICOSE VEIN ISN'T EXACTLY THE HOT ACCESSORY FOR A HAPPY-GO-LUCKY YOUNG BUCK LIKE MYSELF

That made me feel better. If everyone with varicose veins had Braxton's attitude, there'd be a Jessica Simpson song about them playing on TRL right now (or perhaps more accurately, a Ludacris song on 106 & Park). See, youth is more mental than physical. I shouldn't let a superficial sign of age influence how I act—thus, I'm going to keep my varicose vein and refuse to let it bother me. Besides, Doris and Ethel in my bridge club think it's hot. IB

SIB HASHIAN

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Rock icon Sib Hashian, the big-haired former drummer of '70s megaband Boston, was born in Roxbury and raised in Lynn, where he attended Lynn English High School and played drums in the marching band. After graduating in 1967, he spent two years playing in area clubs like the Novelty Lounge, a bar in the Combat Zone. He joined the Army in 1969 and served in Vietnam with the Fourth Infantry Division, earning his discharge as a first lieutenant in 1971. In 1975, he and childhood friend Barry Goudreau teamed up with Boston founder Tom Scholz and recorded the band's first album in Scholz's basement. That album, Boston, released by Epic Records in 1976, has sold more than 17 million copies and remains the biggest-selling debut album in history. In 1978, the band released the multiplatinum Don't Look Back and embarked on a lengthy tour that took them throughout western Europe, Scandinavia, Japan, Canada and the U.S. During the height of their popularity, they played one night in front of 130,000 fans at Dallas' Cotton Bowl Stadium (with Van Halen) and the next night at the Superdome in New Orleans. In 1982, Hashian left the band amid much-publicized infighting. He now lives on the North Shore with his wife and three children, and he is set to co-produce and appear in a production of Art Devine's play 9-Ball, opening April 2 at the Tremont Theatre.

Jonathan Soroff: So what have you been up to for the past 20 years?

Sib Hashian: Since I left the band? I've been raising a family, living happily with my wife, Suzanne. I've had several businesses, including a record and CD store, a musical instrument store. I've had a bar, and a travel agency, and I've played a lot of gigs and written a lot of music with some of the younger guys in town. In 2001, I finally hooked up with my old friend Art Devine, and now I'm working on the play 9-Ball.

JS: So there's life after rock and roll stardom?

SH: Positively. In fact, it's refreshing to have a life after being in the limelight and everyone trying to get a piece of you all the time.

JS: Anything you want to say about the original band breaking up?

SH: Nah. I'd rather not say anything.

JS: You were kinda famous for your hair.

SH: Yeah, I had a huge afro. It was my rebel thing. I'd gotten out of the army, where I had to have short hair, so as soon as I was discharged—September 18th, 1971—I never got another haircut. When our record came out in 1976, that was five years of growth. I've seen publications where I was voted worst hair of the '70s. I actually saw myself on VH1, where people were talking about who had the biggest 'fro. I think I won.

> THE MUSIC [IN THE 1970S] WAS FANTASTIC. YOU CAN STILL LISTEN TO THOSE SONGS. YOU'RE NOT GONNA REMEMBER SONGS YOU HEARD IN THE '90S BECAUSE MOST OF 'EM DON'T EVEN HAVE MELODIES.

JS: Favorite memory that combines sex and drugs and rock and roll?

SH: All three? Which time, really? When we were starting out, me and Franny [Sheehan, the bassist] had to share a room. We were very social, affable fellows, and we always made sure that after the gig we had several lovely ladies up to the room. Everyone was drinking and smoking grass and doing drugs and taking their clothes off. Before you know it, we were swapping mates.

JS: How many pounds of pot seeds would you guess were sifted out on top of the spaceship on that first album cover?

SH: [Laughs.] I think we got a calculation of 3.5 billion, and we wanna thank everybody for that.

JS: How'd you stop your kids from doing all that?

SH: Kids are smart, and my kids grew up in a climate of knowing about it. I'm not going to tell you my kids never experimented with drugs. But if they do them, they're smart about it. They're not hooked on anything. I know, because they're doing their homework.

JS: As a former rock and roll rebel, do you think you were more permissive as a parent raising your kids?

SH: I do have the rock and roll rebel side, but I also have the military-discipline side, so my house was very military. I never let my kids get away with anything.

JS: Best musician you ever knew?

SH: There's a lot of great musicians who never make it to the level of selling millions of records, but of those who did, my favorite was probably Eddie Van Halen. We did several shows with them, and he was just such a master of his instrument. I loved going onstage and watching him play up close.

JS: Isn't it a little embarrassing to see guys who are pushing 60—like Mick Jagger or Steven Tyler—still prancing around in spandex? At what point do you hang it up?

SH: I can't tell anyone how to feel about music, or when to hang it up, but I'm not really a big fan of seeing the older guys out there. First of all, I don't really think they're striking a chord with the young kids, and my attitude is "Give it a rest. Let somebody else do it." If I'm out there, then I'm stopping some young person from being out there. Being in a band is like being in a gang. You're looking for excitement and drugs and girls. At 60 years old, I don't know if you can pull that off.

JS: Do you watch The Osbournes*?*

SH: Yeah, and I feel kinda bad for Ozzy because I think his wife is manipulating him. He really doesn't get to say or do much. It's kinda like the joke's on him. He's a really nice, caring, friendly guy. Never pulls a star trip on anybody. I'm happy to say I'm still a friend of his. Our first gig was opening up for him and Black Sabbath in 1976. How 'bout that?

JS: VH1 has that show about reuniting bands. Any chance that'll happen?

SH: Well, the band is together. Tom still has it up and running as Boston. It's just not the same guys. We were going to do Behind the Music, and that didn't pan out. I knew it wouldn't. I said, "You wanna interview five different guys? There's gonna be five different stories about what went on," and it just never happened.

JS: One thing you miss most about the rock and roll lifestyle?

SH: I don't miss a lot of it, but if I had to pick one thing it would be that feeling after a show, when we'd go back in the drum room for a drink and a smoke, and enjoy that feeling of accomplishment. We'd leave the stage knowing we did a good job. That was rewarding.

JS: What do you think of the local music scene?

SH: It's disappointing now for young musicians. There's nowhere to play. There's no money out there. The record companies don't support their acts the way they used to. Now everyone plays an instrument, and some of the songs, like Rage Against the Machine? Excellent music, but there's only two or three chords, so consequently people are learning how to play songs without learning how to play their instruments. Then there's the fact that musicians these days get paid the same amount I did back in the '60s for playing a gig at a club.

JS: What do you listen to now?

SH: I like classical music, some R&B. I like the oldies stations, and I like modern jazz a lot, with the funk drums and the guitars.

JS: Greatest thing about the '70s?

SH: The music was fantastic. You can still listen to those songs. I think that's the problem with the music today. You're not gonna remember the songs you heard in the '90s, because most of 'em don't even have melodies.

JS: Last question: What's your greatest contribution to rock and roll history?

SH: It might've been my appearance. Or my live performances. On our first album, I kept it simple and laid it down, and I think that's timeless. But I'd like to think people will look back and remember fondly how I treated people and how I treated my craft. IB

GOING COASTAL

FEELING HEMMED IN BY THE CITY? MAKE AN ESCAPE TO THE NEARBY NORTH AND SOUTH SHORES.

Scituate, Plymouth, Glouces-ter, Newburyport. They're so close to our beloved Boston, but how much do you know about what there is to do and see in the towns that lie along the North and South shores? We did some exploring and came up with the perfect itineraries—where to eat, shop, lounge and explore—for one-day getaways.

WEYMOUTH TO PLYMOUTH

BY JUDITH FORMAN

To many, the swath of Route 3 between Boston and Cape Cod is best known as a summer traffic jam. But go beyond the backups, and you'll find a cluster of mostly coastal communities, known together as the South Shore.

Home to city-bound commuters—and everyone ranging from the Pilgrims to the bad boys of Aerosmith—the region is chock full of quintessential New England charm.

Sound fun? Uh, maybe for your parents. But if you look beyond its somewhat staid, country club reputation, the South Shore has plenty to offer a hip, urban day-tripper, from a kitschy coffee chain to a family-run winery to miles of calming beaches.

"The South Shore represents the look and the feel of the Cape and the islands," says Anthony Ambrose, chef/owner of Hingham's Blackfin Chop House and Raw Bar and an eight-year resident of Cohasset. "And to be an hour from Boston and to have that is extraordinary."

Before you head south, a few tips: If you're going on a weekday, plan your trip around rush-hour traffic. Crawling back to Boston in stop-and-go is no fun. And be prepared to rack up some mileage. Even though the South Shore is close to the city, it's a spread-out area with only one major highway (Route 3), so the driving can be slow going. Don't be afraid to ask around for shortcuts and back roads.

Finally, beware of tourist traps, especially around Plymouth—unless you're really eager to see a wax rendition of the first Thanksgiving.

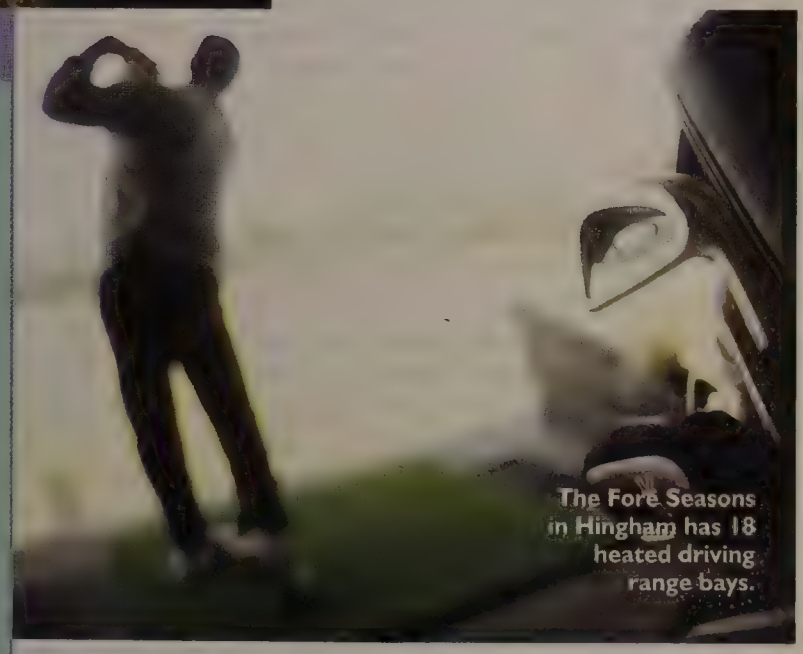
Morning

A half hour outside the city, down Interstate 93 and Route 3, is the first stop of the day. Across from a Dunkin' Donuts on Route 18 in Weymouth is a pink sight more familiar to South Shore java junkies. It's Marylou's Coffee, where locals flock for a morning cup and a strong shot of gossip. Started as one store in 1986 by Abington resident Marylou Sandry, the chain now includes 17 shops across the region.

Flavors at Marylou's Coffee in Weymouth range from banana split to blueberry cinnamon crumble.

Inside, teenage girls in pink Marylou's T-shirts serve coffee in flavors ranging from banana split to blueberry cinnamon crumble. There's also a huge (and inexpensive) selection of iced coffees, frozen drinks, muffins and pastries.

Dressed in her trademark hot pink, Sandry says business has boomed because she can offer better service than the national coffee chains. It's not uncommon for employees to know customers by drink instead of by name, and to save newspapers and take phone messages for regulars.



In Cohasset, Jerusalem Road's decorations include expensive homes and an ocean view.

A Braintree native, Sandry has always lived south of the city and has no plans to leave. "As soon as I get north of Boston, I don't know where I am," she says. "I don't know anything that's up there. So not knowing it, I don't miss it. I think the whole North Shore looks like Chelsea."

After breakfast, hop back onto Route 3 and head south to Route 228 in Hingham, a town dotted with colonial-style New England homes and white-steepled churches. Off Route 3A, you'll find World's End, a 251-acre, peninsula-shaped reservation perfect for hiking, jogging, mountain biking, cross-country skiing and picnicking.

For the $4.50-per-person entrance fee, you can explore the property, which is owned by a non-profit, the Trustees of Reservations. Looking out onto Hingham Harbor on a clear day, you'll see dramatic views of coastal landscapes and the Boston skyline—and feel a peace hard to find in the city.

The Fore Seasons in Hingham has 18 heated driving range bays.

If you'd rather work on your swing, take 228 to Fore Seasons, also in Hingham. The year-round golf center boasts 18 covered and heated driving-range bays and an indoor golf simulator that can reproduce 27 courses from across the country.

Afternoon

The morning's exercise has piqued your appetite, and fried seafood at the Mill Wharf in Scituate is the antidote. Grab a pub table upstairs and you'll be able to see the town lighthouse as you dig into battered scrod, scallops, shrimp, clams and onion rings. The food's pretty standard, but the view of Scituate Harbor is more than worth it.

As you head south, take a leisurely oceanside drive on Jerusalem Road and Atlantic Avenue in Cohasset. By the sparkling water, you'll find multimillion dollar homes that will make you wonder how you get by in a crowded one-bedroom in the South End. According to Nancy Hamilton of the town's Dean & Hamilton Realtors, homes start at $1.2 million and head north to nearly $4 million.

Stop by Plymouth Colony Winery for a peek at the bogs and a taste of sweet cranberry wine.

"Real estate values here are on par with Wellesley and Weston," says Hamilton. "Nobody can say, 'Let's go to the South Shore and look for bargains.'"

Actually, you can—at the Christmas Tree Shops, just off Route 3 (Exit 12) in Pembroke. (You may know the South Yarmouth–based chain of discount gift shops by its annoyingly catchy "Don't you just love a bargain?" TV jingle.) Even if you arrive needing nothing, the store's selection of knick-knacks on the cheap—decorative items, toys, photo albums, stationery, food gifts, baskets and more—is impossible to resist. Your apartment will thank you.

Get back on Route 3 toward Plymouth. Tucked away off Route 44, you'll find Charles Caranci manning his family's winery. Surrounded by 9.5 acres of bogs, the Plymouth Colony Winery specializes in cranberry wine. A lifelong Plymouth resident, Caranci happily offers visitors free tastes of the sweet drink, as well as samplings of his eight other fruit wines. The winery also sells other cranberry goodies, including chutney, jellybeans, sauce and tea. If he's not too busy, Caranci, whose father started the winery in 1982, may show you around the bogs and talk you through the wine-making process.

After the wine tasting, it's time for some serious drinking. Follow 44 across Route 3 to Plymouth Center. Main Street, which becomes Court Street, is crowded with shops and restaurants. Settle into a leather wingback chair upstairs at the British Beer Company with one of the pub's 16 imported draft beers. The bar also stocks 25 bottled beers and 32 kinds of scotch.

Evening

For dinner, forget about surf-and-turf specials. Locals swear by Martha's Galley on Court Street for homemade soups and trattoria-style dining. For a more upscale meal, snag a seat at the nine-table Tuscany Tavern just down the road.

Before you leave Plymouth, stroll along the waterfront with a homemade sundae or an extra-thick frappe from Peaceful Meadows Ice Cream, which has two downtown locations. Or pick up a chocolate caramel praline cocoa at Lalajava for the 50-mile ride back to Boston. But take your time. The lights of the Prudential, unfortunately, are closer than you think.

GLOUCESTER TO ROCKPORT

BY ERIN HAGEDORN

While the South Shore offers a full menu of amusement and shopping, in addition to classic New England charm, a visit to the seaside communities on Massachusetts' North Shore provides a throwback to the region's roots in shipping and fishing. There's still plenty to do, but the overall feel is more sedate, less rushed. Towns like Gloucester and Rockport, on Cape Ann—under an hour's drive from Boston—have all the charm and rustic appeal of Maine's coastal communities, but they're close enough for a day trip.

Gloucester's harbor is dotted with colorful fishing boats.

Morning

A drive up Route 1 from Boston to 128 North brings you to Gloucester, America's oldest seaport. Founded in 1623, the town is still an active fishing port, and much of it has the look and feel of a historic fishing village yet to join the new century (or the second half of the last one). Quaint shops and upscale restaurants add tourist appeal. A fun (and tasty) way to appreciate the local flavor is to have breakfast at the Dory on Commercial Street. The cozy diner is open for breakfast only (until 12:30 pm weekends and 11:30 am week

INLAND INSPIRATION

BY JUDITH FORMAN

It's not on the coastline, so some say it's not technically part of the South Shore. But nitpicking aside, there's still lots to do, see, and eat in the landlocked region just south of Boston. Here's a quick guide to some of the highlights west of the water.

Start the day with a hike around the 125 miles of trail at Blue Hills Reservation, which stretches from Quincy to Randolph. Climb up all 635 feet of Great Blue Hill (the highest of 22 area peaks) for stunning views of Greater Boston. There's also boating, fishing, golfing, ice skating and horseback riding nearby.

Come spring, check out the swimming at Memorial Beach on Lake Massapoag in Sharon. After your swim, stop by Crescent Ridge Dairy for homemade ice cream and frozen yogurt. Open year-round, the "Cridge" (as it's known locally) is especially popular on summer nights, when the parking lot becomes the place to be seen.

If the weather makes you want to stay inside, Braintree's your place. There's indoor kart racing at F1 Boston and more than 180 stores (including H&M, Pottery Barn and Coach) at South Shore Plaza.

A throwback to old-school dining, Town Spa Pizza has been an institution in Stoughton since 1955. The waitresses here are longtime fixtures, and the joint's thin-crust pizzas (linguica is a favorite) and Greek salads have satisfied generations of locals. A newer addition to town is Phatt Boys, which opened in October. Owners Scott Hartford and Fred Rash (both formerly of the Brew Moon/Rock Bottom chain) occasionally offer $75 prix fixe cigar dinners, complete with five courses, four cigars and plenty of cocktails. The restaurant also hosts a weekly jazz and blues brunch from noon to 3 p.m. on Sundays.

If an authentic Irish breakfast is more your speed, spend a lazy Sunday at Finbar's Pub and Meetinghouse in Norwood. For $6.95, chow down (between 9 am and 4 pm) on eggs, rashers, bangers, black and white pudding, home fries and toast—all served by a waitress straight from Kerry.

Sports nuts, take note: On April 12, individual-game tickets go on sale for the Brockton Rox baseball season. For as little as $4, you can watch the local franchise of the independent Northeast League play a game at Campanelli Stadium. Then, if you have time, take a detour to Foxboro, about 15 miles west, and load up on Super Bowl gear at the Patriots Pro Shop.

days), and it's where the fishermen meet up in the early hours. Rolling in at 8 am will make you feel like a late riser compared with the regulars. Fishing paraphernalia decorates the walls (alongside the odd nudie postcard) and nautical pictures cover the tables, as if to remind you what Gloucester is all about. The crowd is a friendly lot—mostly men being served by a no-nonsense waitress who knows nearly everyone by name. (Many regulars even have their own coffee mug hanging on the wall.)

Now that you've had breakfast, pick up a map of the area at the town's chamber of commerce, right next door to the Dory. You can easily walk downtown Gloucester—start by strolling along the harbor to see the fishing and lobster fleets up close. You'll recognize the waterfront from The Perfect Storm, one of several movies filmed here. Along Main and Rogers streets, just a short walk from the ocean, you can window-shop as seagulls screech overhead. After you peruse the shops (don't miss Virgilio's Italian Bakery and the enormous used music and book store Mystery Train), take a short drive along Route 127 South to Stage Fort Park, a boulder-strewn public park overlooking the ocean. Sit at one of the many picnic tables and read, have a romantic moment on the secluded giant rocks overlooking the ocean, or just relax on one of the park's pocket beaches.

Afternoon

For fresh seafood and a front-row view of the fishermen coming in with their catch, have lunch at the Gloucester House Restaurant, on Seven Seas Wharf. Owned by lifelong Gloucester resident Lenny Linquata, it's a local institution. "In Gloucester you don't feel you're in a touristy, commercial place," Linquata says. "People here are down-to-earth. It's one of few places you'll find very poor and very wealthy people at the same place at the same time." If you're lucky, Linquata will be behind the bar. Ask him to tell you the famous story of the legendary local fisherman Howard Blackburn. (Linquata swears he doesn't mind repeating it.)

After lunch, take a quick drive up Route 127 to Rockport, a quaint seacoast town that's more ritzy and touristy than Gloucester. Many of the quaint shops are run by local artists who've lived here for years. Dock Square, in the center of town, features one of Rockport's main attractions, Bearskin Neck, a cluster of knick-knack shops (some were once fishing shacks), cafés and local art galleries along a promontory. It feels a lot like a Vermont town that's been condensed and plopped down on the seaside, and the narrow streets that wander through the small shops lead you to a great view of the harbor.

When you've had your fill of shopping, take a 10-minute drive north along Route 127's winding roads to Gott Avenue, where you'll find the coastal state park Halibut Point. Here, you can walk 10 minutes through the forest (using the self-guided tour brochure that you get in the parking lot) to the renovated World War II fire-control tower that doubles as a visitor center. Just ahead is an enormous granite quarry, and the path next to it takes you to a breathtaking seaside overlook where you can see as far as Maine's Mount Agamenticus and the Isles of Shoals off New Hampshire. Another, shorter trail takes you down to the ocean, where giant mounds of granite sit on the waterline, and you can climb over the rocks and explore the tidal pools.

Halibut Point State Park is on the northernmost tip of Cape Ann. Here, you can hike along the paths surrounding the quarry and walk to scenic outlooks.

Evening

If you're like me, by this point you'll have worked up an appetite. For an elegant dinner by the water, go to Emerson Inn by the Sea's Grand Café. The white-columned inn on the tip of Rockport, just a few minutes from Halibut Point, dates to the turn of the last century. Its romantic, classically decorated dining room offers beautiful oceanfront views, and on weekends, live piano music. In warm months, you can eat outside on the veranda overlooking the shore. Rockport has been a dry town since 1856, when an an axe-wielding seamstress named Hannah Jumper led an uprising of angry local women against drunken men. So be sure to bring your own wine to complement entrées like herb-roasted chicken Statler, beef tenderloin with Anna potatoes and traditional boiled lobster, and rich desserts like chocolate lava cake and crème brûlée. If you choose, you can spend the night in one of the inn's cozy rooms decorated with period furnishings—the ones that look out over the sea are best—and stay for a complimentary breakfast.

NEWBURYPORT AND PLUM ISLAND

BY JESSICA IREDALE

About 30 miles northwest of Rockport and Gloucester's rocky shorelines—near the New Hampshire border—are two centers of coastal Americana that are just as wholesome, with a bit less of the everyone-knows-your-name atmosphere. An hour's drive from Boston on I-95 north through Woburn and Topsfield (take Route 1A if you want the slightly longer, more scenic coastal route) brings you to pristine Newburyport, which sits neatly on the Merrimack River, and its beachside counterpart, Plum Island. The island's light-hearted mishmash of tacky summer shacks and modern beach homes and its nationally renowned bird sanctuary complement Newburyport's upscale, classic architecture (white steeple and all) and classically clad residents (J. McLaughlin's dream market) to create the quiet and quintessentially quaint New England community, free of attitude.

"There are a lot of high-energy, positive and friendly people who are very happy to be here and have access to the waterfront and shops," says Mike Duratti, Newburyport resident and general manager of the Black Cow Tap & Grill. Thrillseekers be forewarned: Despite said high energy, a typical day's activity here—at least for a tourist—includes trolling the boardwalk, hunting for tchotchkes, antiquing and bird-watching. Even typically pushy SUV drivers can be spotted surrendering right of way to pedestrians with a wave and a smile. Nope, you're not in Boston anymore.

Morning

For old-school New England, Newburyport plots are spacious, and buildings aren't as tightly packed together as in, say, historic Marblehead. Nevertheless, it's a walking town. Park your car (on the street or in a lot off Merrimac Street) and get ready to hoof it.

A walk through the sleepy streets leads you past square houses and picket fences, stately brick Federalists and a town mall. Add a couple of '57 Chevys and you've got a scene out of Pleasantville, so why not cop to the part and start the day off with breakfast at the local diner. The neighborhood greasy spoon, Angie's Food, is appropriately located on Pleasant Street. Its menu of standard fare like French toast, short-stack pan-

Once you've filled your stomach, get your brain in gear for the requisite New England history lesson. Did you know Newburyport is considered the birthplace of the U.S. Coast Guard? Didn't think so. But if you like obscure American history, carry on to the Range Lights, a pair of Coast Guard–operated lighthouses dating from the 19th century; the Old Hill Burying Ground, where many a sea captain and famous Revolutionary are buried; and Newburyport Public Library, an 18th-century structure where George Washington, John Quincy Adams and Benedict Arnold are said to have visited. All are within walking distance of the town center.

Newburyport's Black Cow Tap & Grill has fresh seafood and steaks, and a waterfront view.

Personalize your purse with mix 'n' match patterns and styles at Anna William in Newburyport.

With the history lesson complete, head to the town shopping district. In the State Street and Market Square vicinities, perfectly laid brick sidewalks wind past neat brick storefronts, many of which were reappointed in the 1970s. The eclectic mix of shops and galleries includes Soak, a bath shop that stocks products from the Plum Island Soap Company among other items from around the world; Soufflés, a kitchen store/coffee bar where you can buy a bamboo cheese grater and get your caffeine fix; and Anna William, a custom handbag store that lets you choose from nine styles and 130 fabrics to create a bag that's all you. Not to be missed is Wishbasket at the Tannery, a one-stop showroom for interesting high-end odds and ends—everything from Kiehl's skin care products to matelasse bedding to vintage wine label paintings, gourmet cheeses and grapefruit marmalade.

Afternoon

Shopping seems to have a direct correlation to appetite, so by this time you might want to head over to the Rockfish for some pub grub in a brownstone overlooking State Street, the town's main drag. The menu is "creative American"—soups, sandwiches, pasta, etc.

Next, it's off to Plum Island, and biking or driving is the way to go. Follow the causeway, passing the marshland on the right and the gas station on your left, and you'll reach a coastline peppered with flimsy beach cottages and upscale waterfront homes. With 11 miles of—let's face it—just sand and dunes, you've got two choices: enjoy miles of beautiful public beach, or head to the Parker River National Wildlife Refuge. The 4,662-acre sanctuary is home to more than 800 species of birds, plants and animals and is ranked as one of the nation's premier bird-watching areas. Self-guided tours take you through dunes, marshes, observation towers and platforms, and a checklist of birds you can spot at the refuge is available at the entrance gatehouse. Parking at the reservation costs $5 per car or $2 per bike.

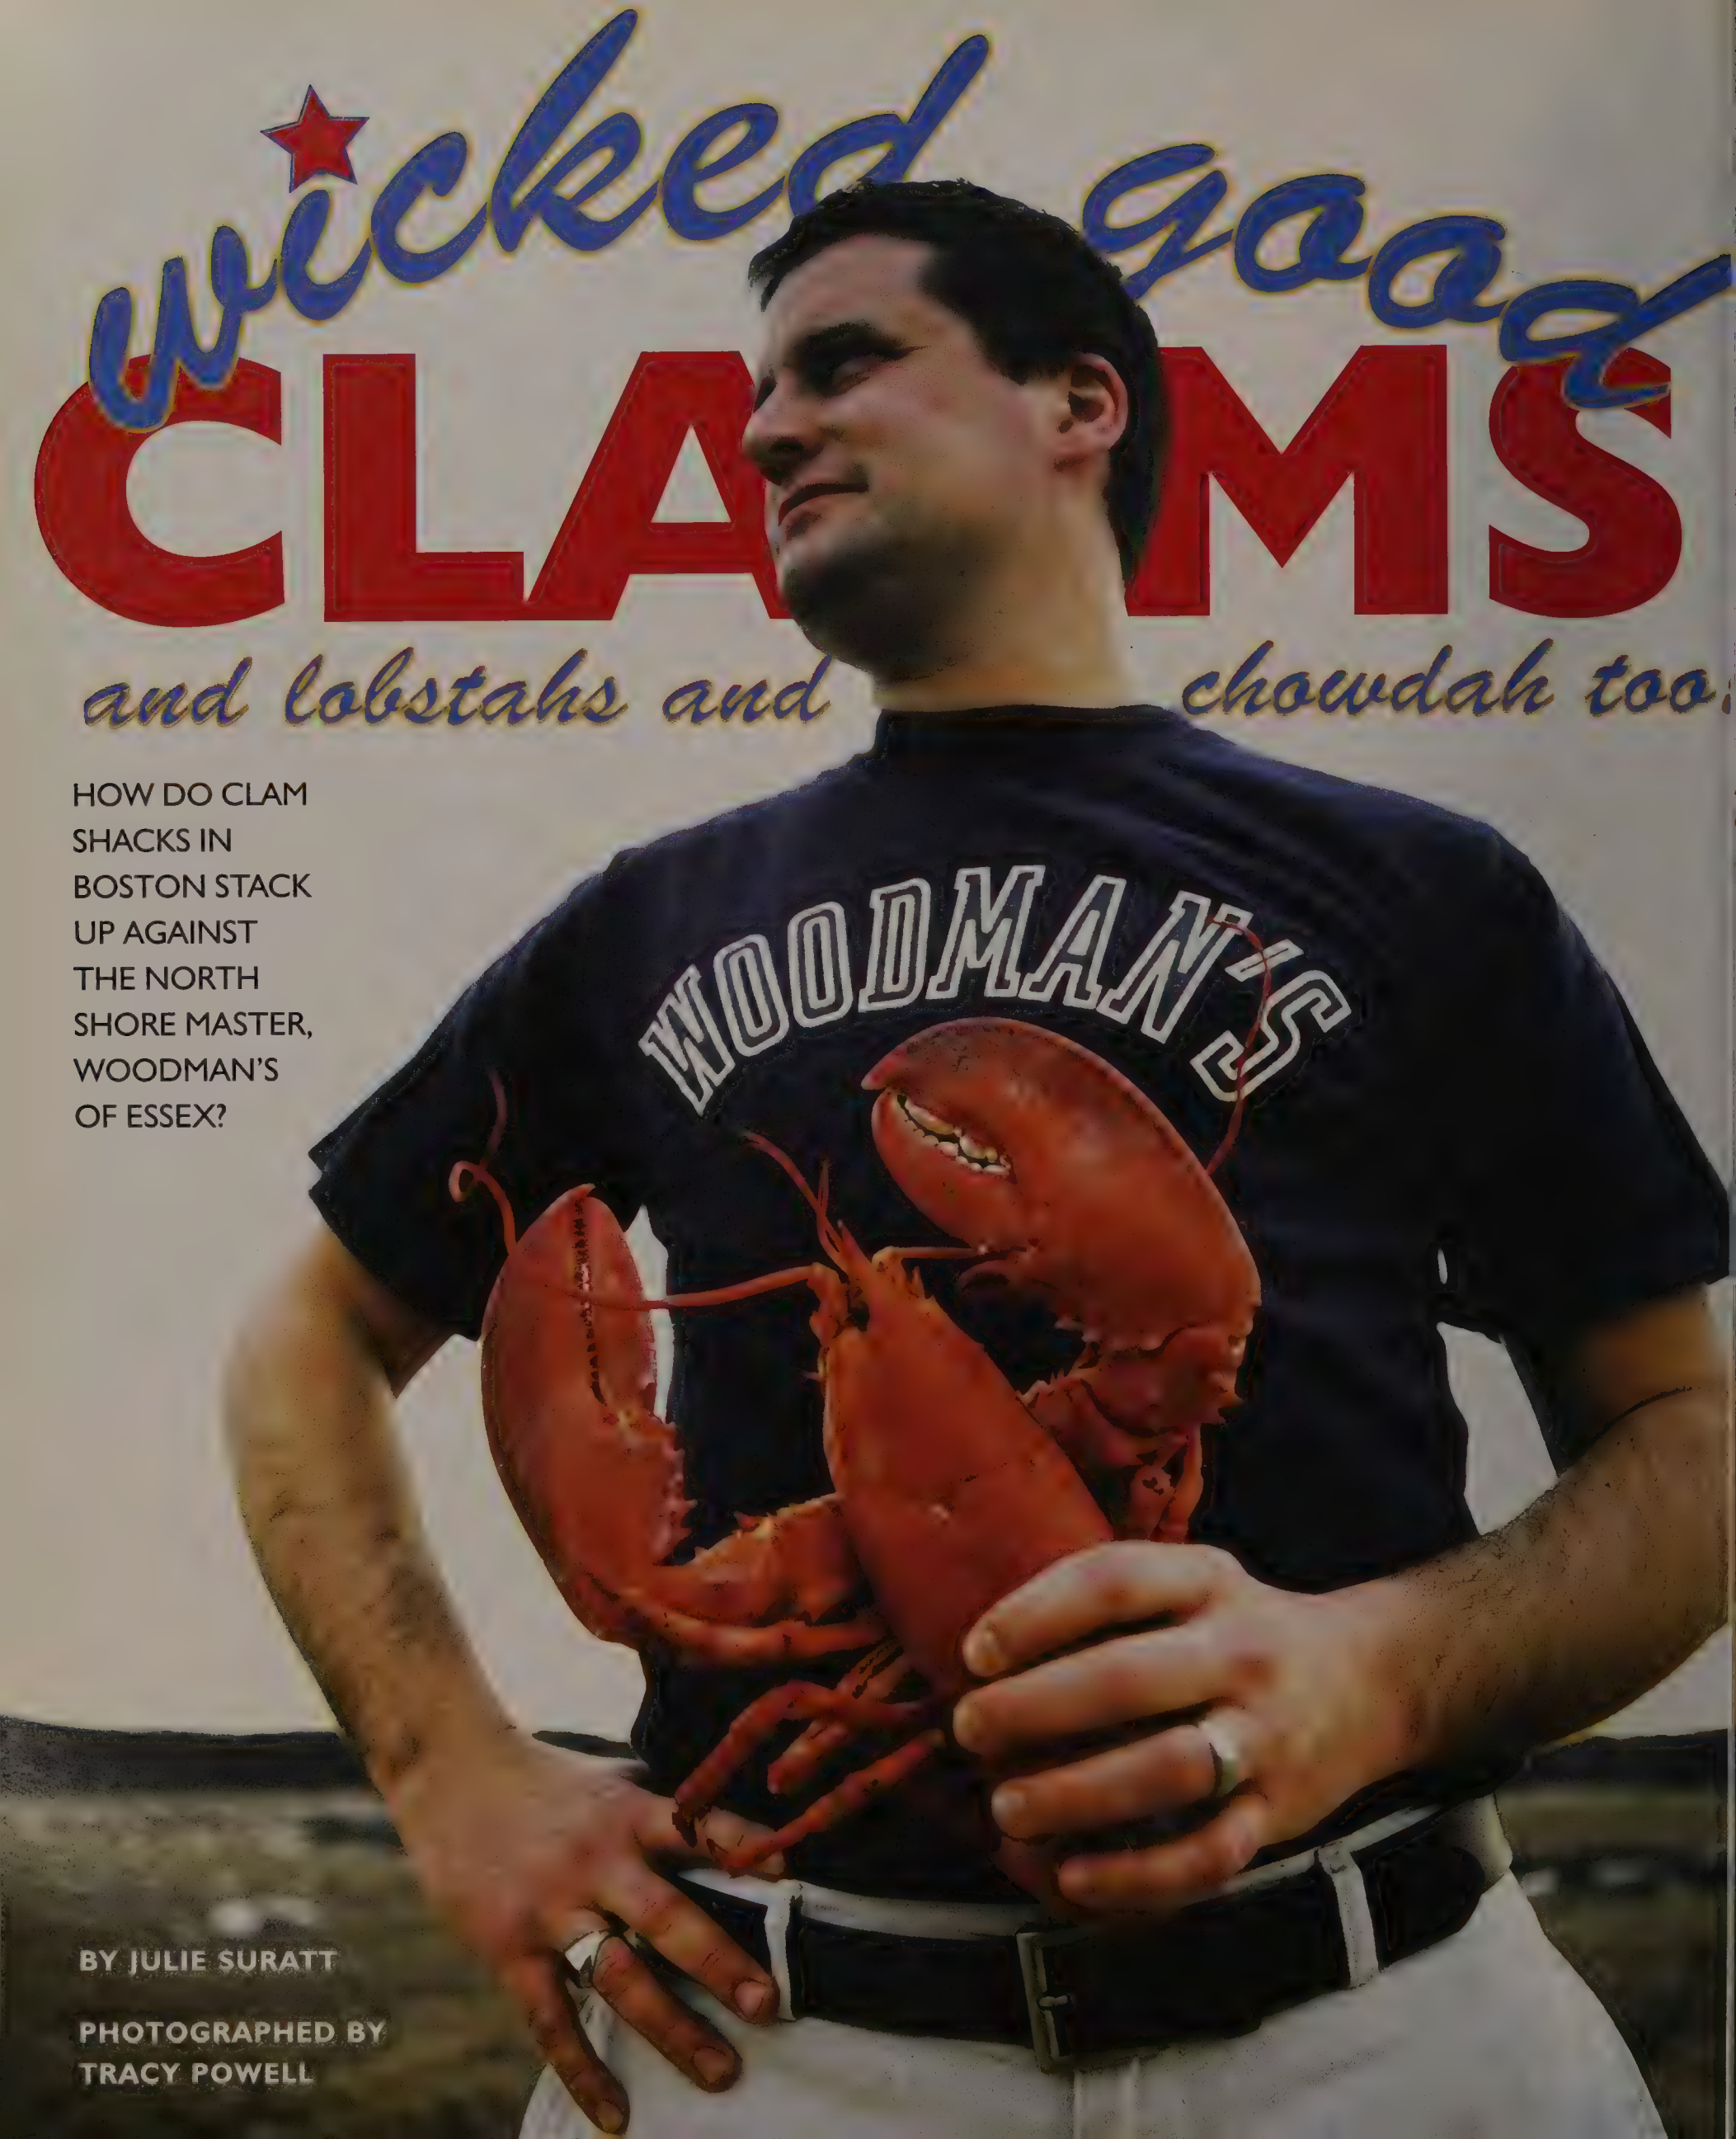
Evening



You might be familiar with the Black Cow Tap & Grill from its sibling venture in South Hamilton, Mass. The Newburyport location of the upscale seafood and steak house attracts diners from surrounding towns for its renowned cuisine, as well as its prime cut of real estate overlooking the river. If it's a nice night, try for a table on the waterfront porch. Otherwise, the dining room's got charm to spare with a lofted ceiling, hunter green walls, dark wood tables and booths, picture windows and a fireplace. A word to the wise: Don't skip the basil butter and fluffy white rolls—they alone are worth the trip. The menu is equally divided between meat and fish dishes, and entrées run from $17–$29. Baked haddock with white wine, lemon and cracker crumbs ($19) is a staff recommendation, but the grilled sirloin with red-skin mashed potatoes, grilled asparagus, blue cheese and shallot–red wine sauce ($25) ain't exactly chopped liver. Afterwards, take a starlit, digestive stroll along the riverside boardwalk that was recently revamped to the tune of $2 million. Take in the view, turn around, walk back and head home. iB

HOW DO CLAM SHACKS IN BOSTON STACK UP AGAINST THE NORTH SHORE MASTER, WOODMAN'S OF ESSEX?

BY JULIE SURATT

PHOTOGRAPHED BY TRACY POWELL

Is there anything closer to heaven than a crispy, plump fried clam smothered with tangy tartar sauce? A tender hunk of lobster tail dripping with melted butter? A bowl of creamy chowder chock-full of clams and diced potatoes? Not for the true Yankee born-and-bred. But the setting and circumstances in which these delicacies are consumed must be just right: Forget crisply starched tablecloths, fine china and candlelight. Instead, think picnic tables, paper plates, plastic bibs and kitschy decor. In other words, think New England clam shack.

These casual restaurants dispense with all formalities and focus on one thing: serving up the freshest seafood in its most basic form—fried, boiled, steamed or broiled.

Here in Boston, we're surrounded by a number of clam shacks on the North and South shores, and of course, there are dozens on Cape Cod. But when you get a hankering for steamers or fried clams, and you're not up for an hour's drive, what are you to do?

Well, you're in luck. Boston sports a handful of eateries that offer seafood in the rough, among them Jasper White's Summer Shack, the Barking Crab, Jimbo's, No Name, Morse Fish Company and Court House Seafood. But how do they measure up against the real McCoy? To find out, I start with a drive to the North Shore to visit what many consider to be the quintessential New England clam shack: Woodman's of Essex. Legend has it that Chubby Woodman invented the fried clam back in 1916 when, at the suggestion of a local fisherman, he threw a shucked clam coated with cornmeal into a fryer. The momentous occasion warranted a note in the family bible, just after the birthdates of the Woodmans' two oldest sons: "We fried the first fried clam—in the town of Essex, July 3, 1916."

Business has been booming ever since.

I've arranged to meet Steve Woodman—Chubby's grandson—and his wife, Rhonda, for lunch. My goal is to find out from the experts what constitutes a real New England clam shack. I thought business would be slow on a Monday in February. Wrong. The place is hopping, although not nearly as crowded as on a summer day—when the line stretches out the door and down the street (and it's 45 minutes from the moment you get in line until you order).

Facing page: Eian Woodman, great-grandson of Chubby Woodman, proudly shows off a North Shore lobster. Top: The ultimate New England clam shack, Woodman's opened in 1914. Bottom: No Name, on Boston's Fish Pier, dates to 1917.

A giant wooden structure with picture windows overlooking a salt marsh, Woodman's has grown significantly from its origins as a roadside clam shack. Ninety years later, it seats 280 and serves up to 2,000 patrons a day. The classic recipes remain the same however. The fried clams are dipped in milk and coated with corn flour. The tartar sauce is great-aunt Joane's recipe.

I let Rhonda order, explaining that I want to try typical clam shack fare, and shortly after, a bounty arrives on a plastic tray: fried clams, steamers, boiled lobster, clam chowder, a lobster roll, onion rings and a fried-seafood platter. Between bites, I ask the pair, who are later joined by Steve's brother Doug, to tell me what constitutes a real New England clam shack.

First and foremost, Steve says, the entrées stick to the basics—fried, boiled and steamed. "Nothing's baked. It takes too long." You won't find monkfish marsala or seared tuna—just locally caught fish. And dessert is not part of the experience. The aim is to get the customer in and out in under an hour (which also explains the slightly uncomfortable bench seating). If you're still hungry after, you can get a soft-serve ice cream down the street.

Some of the other criteria that we decide are part of the "real" clam shack experience include ordering and pickup at a counter; menu written on a blackboard; paper plates and plastic utensils; nautically themed décor; wooden picnic tables; draft beer served in plastic cups; bathing suits and flip-flops welcome; and a water view.

To be fair, Rhonda Woodman acknowledges that the typical seaside clam shack might not thrive in Boston proper, pointing out that Bostonians expect table service, a wider selection of options on the menu, and glasses (as opposed to plastic cups) from a bar. In fact, some of our urban seafood shanties do have counter ordering and pick-up, but bathing suits and flip-flops might be too much to hope for.

THE CONTENDERS

Adjusting my mind-set to allow for these differences, I set out to gorge myself on fried clams, chowder, lobster and steamers. Armed with a set of standards, I spend the next week seeing how Boston clam shacks compare with the Essex classic.

Jimbo's

Located on the South Boston waterfront, Jimbo's—owned by the Doulos family—is the more casual version of Jimmy's Harborside, which it abuts. It might as well be miles away, though. With marine blue walls, low ceilings and nautical décor, Jimbo's feels like the lower depths of a cruise ship. The plastic menu has all the typical dishes you'd find at a clam shack, plus a few outliers: chili, chicken Parmesan and nachos. A waitress takes my order as I sit at a Formica-top table and look out at an amazing view of Boston Harbor and Logan Airport beyond. The lightly battered clams arrive in a red plastic basket with a wedge of lemon and a dish of tartar sauce. They're a bit greasy, but the accompanying clam chowder is thick and creamy, with potato chunks and bits of clams. Both the fried clams and the chowder are made from 80-year-old recipes, according to manager Michael Minihane. Have they ever thought of switching up? "If it ain't broke, why fix it?" he responds. Enough said.

Why go? Open-air seating on a wooden balcony overlooking the Harbor.

No Name

Down the block from Jimbo's (and sharing a similar view) is No Name. Opened in 1917 by founder Yannis Contos and popular with local fishermen, the diner was called No Name because it originally had no sign. If Jimbo's feels like the steerage level of a boat, No Name is above the waterline (if not exactly on the upper deck), with paintings of ships on the walls and framed black-and-white photos of South Boston. I take a seat near the big windows at the back, fill a plastic cup with ice water from a pitcher on the table and peruse the menu. It has all the usual faves but also a selection of homemade pies (including a delicious strawberry rhubarb). Jimmy Klidaras, the nephew of owner Nick Contos, sits down with me, and we discuss local clam shacks. He's heard that Chubby Woodman invented the fried clam, but "we perfected it," he says. They are delicious: fat and juicy, with a light coating of cracker meal. The sautéed seafood platter (lobster, scallops and shrimp) is perfectly cooked. But the real winner here is the seafood chowder, chock-full of shrimp, clams, cod and haddock in a buttery broth.

Why go? Amazing prices.

15½ Fish Pier, Boston (617-423-2705).

Morse Fish Company

The oldest fish market in New England, Morse is a staple in the South End. I bypass the display case, which is stocked with more than 20 types of fish, and weave my way through a maze of Formica tables and plastic patio chairs to a counter in the back. "Two-way with shrimp and oysters," shouts the guy in front of me to the chef. I look up at the illuminated menu board to see what he's getting: The combination dinners let you choose two, three or four seafood items from the menu and pair them with veggies, rice, French fries or cole slaw. "We encourage customers to be creative with their choices," says co-owner John Blacker. Not feeling in a creative mood, I opt for the standard seafood dinner. The chef passes a Styrofoam container heavy with fried haddock, scallops, shrimp, clams and French fries over the counter. I park myself by the window in the front and dip fat clam bellies into tartar sauce, sprinkle lemon over crispy fried haddock and dunk tender shrimp into a plastic dish of hot sauce. I mean to eat only a little, but 20 minutes later, the container is empty. I love every bite. There's no ocean view, but the giant Cathedral of the Holy Cross more than makes up for it. So do specials like soft-shell crab sandwich, monkfish, red perch and rainbow trout.

Why go? No frills, no pretenses; just fresh seafood how you like it.

Top: The Barking Crab sits on Fort Point Channel. Bottom: The Summer Shack combines Jasper White hospitality with a seaside atmosphere.

The Barking Crab

An admission: I love this place. It's fun, cozy and in the summer has the lively atmosphere of a German beer garden. Everything is mismatched—from the chairs and tables to the spoons and forks. Lobster traps, fishnets and wooden buoys abound. Picnic tables are set with big stones (to crack the shells of crabs and lobsters) and plastic buckets filled with chopsticks and napkins. Bartenders serve up soda and beer in plastic cups, and the windows look out over Fort Point Channel (and the three swans that visit daily). The Barking Crab first opened as a seasonal restaurant in 1994 and eventually took over the Neptune Lobster and Seafood Market next door to become a year-round operation. So despite the fact that it serves spicy coconut shrimp curry, this is the real deal. Don't miss the spicy fried calamari with hot pepperoncini, the crab cakes, baked stuffed lobster and the Jonah crab claws.

Why go? Dine next to a wood-burning stove in the winter or under a big red and yellow tent in the summer.

88 Sleeper St., Boston (617-426-2722).

Jasper White's Summer Shack

Jasper White had the best of intentions when he built his second coastal clam shack in the city (after the original in Cambridge). The Summer Shack's menu included all the usual favorites: steamers, lobster, fried clams and chowder—even corn dogs. He offered walk-up window service, and specials were scrawled in chalk on a blackboard. Patrons perched at crowded picnic tables and dined off paper plates. The only thing missing was the cry of seagulls and the pounding surf. Yet there was one problem: Patrons visiting a Jasper White restaurant didn't quite take to serving themselves. So White went back to the drawing board, and while the revamped eatery still honors the original concept of a seaside clam shack, he's made a few concessions to appeal to the finicky city dweller.

Tables are still wrapped in brown paper, and red plastic buckets catch stray shells, but friendly waiters make the rounds, and patrons order off a plastic menu. What remains of the original concept is the fantastically fresh seafood prepared to perfection. Steamers are gently cooked in a clam broth with tiny bits of celery. Ipswich clams are dipped in flour and spices, fried to a light, crispy finish and served with a slice of lemon and a small dish of tartar sauce. White has put together an amazing raw bar featuring cold-water oysters and clams. And as a result of customer demand, he's added to the menu the pièce de résistance: pan-roasted lobster, a truly mouth-watering delicacy topped with butter, chervil and chives. I'm still dreaming about it.

Why go? With Jasper White overseeing the menu, this is the most gourmet clam shack you'll ever try.

50 Dalton St., Boston (617-867-9955).

Court House Seafood

"If you're in the mood for a particular type of fish—say kingfish or mullet—and it's not on our menu, you can go next door to our fish market and buy it, and we'll steam, fry or broil it for you here," says Diane McGaffigan, manager of Court House Seafood in East Cambridge. That's fresh.

Court House doesn't have much of a view, nor does it sell beer, but it does make the most delectable fishcakes around. A Portuguese specialty, fishcakes are a mixture of whitefish and potato, coated with breading and deep fried. Right out of the fryer, they're hot and crisp on the outside, and—dipped in homemade tartar sauce—tender and moist inside, with a slightly peppery taste. Peruse the menu above the counter, order and then take a paper plate loaded with fried fish, stuffed clams or linguica (Portuguese sausage) back to the table and dig in with a plastic fork. Save room for the chocolate cake for dessert.

Why go? The Damaso family has a way with seafood. Try the fried sardines or stickleback, which are flown in from Portugal every Thursday. Or you can't go wrong with the fish cakes.

SHALL WE dance?

DON'T WANT TO FEEL LIKE A DORK IN A CLUB OR BALLROOM? LOCAL DANCE CLASSES—FROM SWING TO SALSA TO HIP-HOP—TEACH SMOOTH MOVES YOU CAN USE.

BY LIZA WEISSTUCH PHOTOGRAPHED BY BRIAN SILVERSTEIN

If you stumbled on the dance floor at the last wedding you attended—or maybe while attempting a spin and a moonwalk to celebrate the Patriots' Super Bowl victory—have no fear. You don't have to be forever doomed to make excuses or wait at the bar whenever the music strikes up and the dancing begins.

Dance classes are a prime way to mix up an exercise routine, impress a special someone and meet new people. Any night of the week, you can find a different place around the city—from dance studios to clubs and bars—where instructors will guide you on the path to grace, coordination and confidence. Classes range from Irish set and West Coast swing to salsa and hip-hop. Some feature tricky moves, but none require performance experience, specialized shoes or legwarmers. Heck, you don't even need rhythm, but it helps. Even if you don't end up moving like Justin Timberlake or Beyonce, it's not too late get up on your two left feet and train them to groove.

Sophia's popular Salsa Wednesdays kick off with group lessons before the dance floor opens up for a fiery-footed free for all.

SALSA WITH A CLUBBY KICK

Mambo king Tito Puente once explained that salsa is what you eat, mambo is what you dance. Simple enough, right? If only the motions were as basic. You can get instruction in salsa's swift, fiery footwork at a variety of city venues. (Despite Puente's definition, "salsa" has become the default label for the popular dance done to Latin music.) One popular option, Salsa Wednesdays, takes place at a bona fide dance club, Sophia's. The evenings kick off at 8 pm with a class in casino rueda—couple-dancing in a circle, a traditional style that has become a popular Cuban children's game. You need not bring a better half, as partner-swapping is part of the fun.

Counting to eight is the easy part—it's what you do on each count that's tricky. Whether you join the beginner, intermediate or advanced circle (or as I call them, mild, medium or spicy), the instructors are patient bundles of energy. They know everyone is here to have fun. There are usually plenty of beginners among the 50 to 60 attendees, a healthy portion of whom don't even consider themselves regulars on the club circuit (which explains the range of attire, from get-ups that J. Lo and Ricky Martin would envy to jeans and sweaters).

When the rueda lesson ends at 9, the circle formations break down and the traditional salsa fires up. The crowd splits in two, and the Giraldo brothers—who have danced nationwide with their company Salsa y Control—each lead a group: Johnny takes the experienced dancers while Andres directs the beginners. Steps, stops and swirls are the name of the game that makes salseros out of all. When the dance floor opens up an hour later, and the music that has been intermittently supplied starts flowing freely, another hundred people arrive, and the brothers blend in with the revelers—sort of. (They're easily identified as the ones with no reservations about whirling.) Many who wouldn't ordinarily envision themselves swiveling their hips start keeping count to the Latin beats. The lessons play no small role in helping people shed the self-consciousness they may have brought with them.

"It's fun and low-pressure," says Andrea Vovk, 31, a research scientist from Brookline. "It doesn't matter what group you're in. Everybody looks as silly as you might feel. And the instructors—besides being friendly and outgoing—are patient."

"Everyone is here because of a common interest—everybody wants to learn how to dance," says Pepé Leyva, 34, a hair salon owner from Cuba who now lives in South Yarmouth. "It's the opposite of Lansdowne Street. There's so much socializing and not much drinking going on. It's a whole different culture."

SWINGIN' IT WEST COAST STYLE

The first thing you learn at Downtown Swing (at Ned Devine's when I attended but moving to Stadium in South Boston as of March 22) is that swing dancing doesn't just cover the jump, jive and wailing moves that signify the 1930s the way break dancing did the '80s. That energetic East Coast style enjoyed a renaissance in the late '90s thanks to the popularity of neo-swing bands like Big Bad Voodoo Daddy and Squirrel Nut Zippers. West Coast swing, however, is slower and groovier (read: easier to pick up). It's a stylized form that's more back-and-forth oriented than up-and-down. And because it's done to just about any style of music, it's an equal-opportunity boogie style.

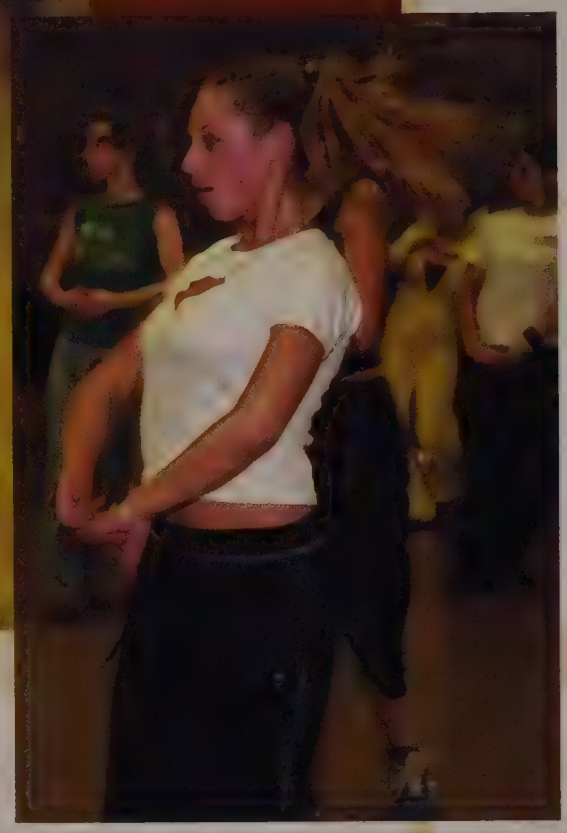
"If you can clap to the beat and you can walk, you can learn West Coast swing," Jon Schimmel, the lively instructor, tells me. "There's a fair amount of information, so it takes time to get it all down, but once you've got the info, you can do it. And because you can dance it to such a wide variety of music, including contemporary, it appeals to a lot of people."

Thanks to the New England Swing Dance Network, an organization that promotes the growth of the West Coast swing community, there's somewhere to groove almost every night of the week in the Boston area. Ned Devine's began hosting the network's Monday night swing classes in January, with introductory level lessons beginning at 6:30. Schimmel says they'll follow the same routine at Stadium.

The dance has a leader and a follower and includes six basic foot patterns. It takes practice, but don't be shy about asking questions of whoever's gripping your hand. It's part of getting to know everyone.

During the one-hour introductory lesson, I meet half the class because the session proceeds in a line-dance format: Once the instructor teaches my half of the class the follower's moves, we reconvene with those who learned the leader's part. The two groups form parallel lines, which allows for systematic rotation of partners (and makes it tough for those who come as a couple). Chit-chatting among the passing partners becomes less common as the intermediate class starts and serious concentration is called for. Thankfully, the more advanced dancers who arrive for the later class lend a leading hand as turns are thrown into the mix of side-cross-backs and triple steps.

After the intermediate lesson, the DJ, who'd been playing a healthy mix of R&B and classic soul, cranks up the volume and the instructors shut off their mikes. Those of us fresh from the lessons are anxious to see how much we remember without someone counting aloud. While a few dozen more swing kids arrive, suck back a drink, and hit the floor, others comfortably ask for a dance from someone they stepped with in class.



"It's a total social outlet," says Brian Barakauskas, 28, who teaches country dancing. "I think people take lessons so they can become better dancers, so they can dance with more people and have a better time."

HIP-HOP AROUND

If so many people in so many videos can do it—even the people in the background—then hip-hop dancing can't be that tough, right? Well, maybe if you practice religiously. The routines Carl Alleyne teaches in Hip Hop Explosion at the Dance Complex involve a lot of spins, kicks and slides, which are basic enough. But there are also sequences that defy words, which Alleyne steers with a string of "ah, ah, ah, ah, uh." Don't worry if you don't get the hang of the steps at first. He breaks down each sequence enough times that when he brings it all together, the rapid-fire moves will at least look familiar. Plus Alleyne encourages you to add your own finesse, so if what you do looks wildly different from his kicks and hops, just tell yourself you're adding your signature.

Perhaps Marjorie Dove, 23, who works for a nonprofit, puts it best by explaining that the class is "less about aerobics than learning how to dance. If you come for an aerobic workout, you're not gonna cut it." It's more about learning a style than following someone's motions to get your blood pumping.

Since the Dance Complex attracts experienced dancers who come for ballet and jazz classes—not to mention flamenco and African—many classically trained twirlers come to Hip Hop Explosion for a change of pace. Then there are those who "just want to learn how to dance like they see people doing it on TV," says Theo Martinez, 27, a personal trainer from Nashua, N.H. "[Hip-hop] is a popular dance style, and there are lots of places to go that play that kind of music. A lot of people take the class so they can dance better when they go out."

A LITTLE WALTZ, A LITTLE SWING, SOME HUSTLE AND SAMBA, EVERYTHING!

"We can't dance in the reception room, people. It must be done in the ballroom," says Martin Rebello in a half-scolding, half-joking tone. He ushers about a dozen loiterers into the main ballroom of Arthur Murray Dance Studio, and one of the studio's eight instructors follows behind with an enormous bowl of punch. About 20 people are already waiting, shaking their shoulders, stretching or going over a recently learned foot pattern. The mood of the room is a cross between a serious ballet class and a high school dance, until Mark Anthony's "I Need to Know" pipes in over the sound system and Rebello suggests energetically, "Waltz, waltz, waltz!"

Every Thursday night, students taking classes at any level—group or private—gather for a party. It's a chance for people to strut the stuff they recently picked up in class, learn new maneuvers from other, perhaps more experienced, dancers (at least six of the eight instructors join in) and meet people who also like to dance.

"I hear a hustle," Rebello booms as "Mony Mony" kicks into high gear. Most ask others to dance with reckless abandon, regardless of attire, age or ability, as I quickly learn when one of the instructors approaches me and offers his hand. Larry Bonneau has been teaching at Arthur Murray for 20 years, so chances are he instinctively knows how much assistance I could use. In other words, it's less a gesture of gallantry than pity.

But according to most students, having a chance to step and spin with slick steppers is part of what draws the Thursday throng.

"Everybody is very friendly and accepting," says Clive Anderson, 21, a college student. "No matter how good you are, everyone asks everyone else. People who are really advanced and have been taking classes for years have the patience to teach beginners."

The range of students isn't surprising given the variety of classes offered—from tango to hustle to swing to merengue—and the levels accommodated. According to Rebello, the Latin styles and swing classes have been most popular of late. What's striking about the Thursday affair is how the array of generations organically melts together as the rhythms pulse. Everyone has a different motivation for signing up for lessons, to be sure. Many couples take classes for their wedding, for instance. But on Thursday nights, reasons take a back seat to results.

"It's foxtrot time," says Rebello, stepping off the dance floor and resuming his MC role as a Frank Sinatra tune starts up. Some gallop off to the sidelines, while a few gents approach Margaret Linda, 83, who selects a lucky fellow. Linda, by the way, is one of the regulars who teaches partners a fresh move or two.

"I always wanted to learn to dance," says Will Butts, 28, an accountant from Dorchester. "I was at a club and I couldn't do it. So I decided to try [a class] and now I'm here every night of the week." Like Mark Anthony says, for some it's a matter of needing to know.

GREEN WITH RHYTHM

Ger Cooney is encouraging. She encourages people to drink a pint or two before class. It loosens you up, she says. She encourages everyone to have a good laugh. And once the merry music begins, her affirming shouts encourage beginners like me not to throw in the towel when the sets get too quick and the reels set my head spinning.

Cooney has been teaching set dancing in the Backroom at the Burren for seven years. Many regular students aren't here on this Monday night in February because they've flown off to Kerry, Ireland, to participate in the Gathering Festival of Irish music, dance and song—a clear indication of how addictive many find set dancing to be. Not to be confused with Riverdance-style step dancing, set is done in a group comprising four couples in formations similar to square dancing. This Irish tradition is measured in three-beat units called "bars," the timing of which depends on whether the music is a jig, reel, polka, slide or hornpipe.

Up to 60 people join the group on a typical Monday. Some, as I find out when a partner guides me assuredly, are regulars. But there are plenty of other novices who, without the assistance of ale, stumble and lurch as we whirl, hop, lock elbows and fling partners across the circle. Many say their initial interest was sparked because of a thirst to learn more about Gaelic culture. Some got hooked because they were hanging out at the Burren and were lured by the music playing in the Backroom. But for those versed in other dance styles, the intrinsic partner-swapping makes this a choice style for many.

"The music is a lot of fun to dance to, plus it gives you a chance to interact with the whole set of people instead of just dancing with one partner," says Richard Barbalace, a 31-year-old engineer from Cambridge.

The interaction often continues after the lesson finishes and fiddlers play jigs, reels and polkas in the bar area. The patrons are treated not only to live traditional tunes, but spontaneous dancing, too. IB

HOMETOWN HEART BREAKER

INTERVIEW BY SAMANTHA HOUSE | PHOTOGRAPHS BY JOE GREENE

Back in 1986, if you told me I was going to meet New Kid on the Block Joey McIntyre, I would have squealed with glee and called all my friends to brag. Now that I'm a little older, and more mature, such things don't affect me that way. So when I had the chance to do a photo shoot with the Jamaica Plain native and talk to him about his new album, 8:09, I thought, "I'll just be cool." Unfortunately, that was in no way what happened once he actually arrived.

McIntyre showed up on time with his new wife, Barrett, who looks like a petite supermodel. He shook everyone's hand, and his quick wit and easy manner made it clear why women around the world swoon for him. To calm my nerves, I turned my attention to the clothes. I handed him a pair of white pants and told him that if he was wearing colored undies, we couldn't use them because they'd show through. My face turned about five shades of red when he replied, "Don't worry, I'm not wearing any."

When I finally got up the courage to ask him a little more about himself, here's what he had to say.

Samantha House: You just finished a new album, how do you feel about it?
Joey McIntyre: I'm thrilled. Artistically, we slaved over it, and I think that the intent of the record came out in the finished product.
SH: Describe the music.
JM: It's inspired by more old school R&B with a modern production feel, but it's really about the songs.
SH: What's the story behind the album title?
JM: When I went out to do Boston Public, I needed a place to stay. The real estate broker (Barrett, now his wife) found me a place, and the address was 809. That's where I wrote the album. The funny thing is that Barrett and I met on 8/09 and got married the next year on 8/09, so it's a pretty significant number.
SH: How much time do you spend in Boston?
JM: I visit about four times per year for a few weeks at time. I like to catch all the seasons
SH: What do you miss about Boston when you're gone?
JM: It's so different from LA and New York. I can relax here—it's a good getaway. To quote Joe Perry: "It's a world-class city with a small-town feel".
SH: Where do you like to hang out when you're here?
JM: Aquitaine Bis in Chestnut Hill and Doyle's are my favorites.
SH: When we talked in 2002, you were just starting your stint on Boston Public. Now that it's over, how do you feel about the experience?
JM: It was awesome—getting that gig changed my life—I moved to LA, met my wife and wrote my record. Working on a show like that was a great learning experience. I really enjoyed the process of it all.
SH: What's next for you?
JM: I plan to go on tour in the summer and just do a lot of promoting.
SH: Are you planning to make any videos for your album—and what about future projects with MTV*?*
JM: With this album, I plan on making some videos, but they will probably end up on VH1 rather than MTV.
SH: You just got married, how is that treating you?
JM: It's awesome. We're always together because I don't want to have to run back and forth from coast to coast. When you're traveling around, you just want to have your wife with you. She's an awesome person and very supportive. I really appreciate and depend on her opinion.
SH: Finally, please assure us that you and Barrett will never do a reality show based on your life together.
JM: Not based on our marriage. I like Nick and Jess. I think they're real people and they're able to pull off their show. I think they were somehow able to keep their dignity—which is hard to do in a situation like that. A year ago I would have said they were crazy for doing it. But in this day and age, it's a good way to show people what you're doing.

MOPSY

SERENDIPITOUS SHOPPING: OUR UNFETTERED CORRESPONDENT SEEKS OUT THE SALUBRIOUS AND THE CEREBRAL

BY MOPSY STRANGE KENNEDY

POETRY TREASURE, POSSIBLY VANISHING

The Grolier Poetry Book Shop, at 6 Plympton St., Cambridge, is an atmospheric literary goldmine that's been around since 1927. Call 617-547-4648 or go to www.grolierpoetrybookshop.com.

Back when the literary life was centered around places like Sylvia Beach's Shakespeare and Company, the Paris bookshop where erudite, beret-wearing poets and readers gathered, the atmosphere was probably something like what you'd find today in Harvard Square's Grolier Poetry Book Shop. In rare antique coziness, 16,000 books—both well-known and deliciously obscure titles—line the walls up to the stained glass above. Many of the volumes are as slim as a moonbeam. Black-and-white photos of poets who've stopped by speckle the walls. (Cambridge is a "laureate cluster" home to both a former U.S. poet laureate, Robert Pinsky, and the incumbent, Louise Glück.) Owner and local icon Louisa Solano converses with poets, academics and other trollers of metaphor, discussing books and their authors as if they're old friends, which they often are. She'll climb a ladder to scout out a line from Tennyson, or compare the second and fifth books of a particular poet. Grolier sells lots of international poetry, including Asian and Spanish works, along with American tomes. In "in-verse" proportion to its august poetic-shrine status, Grolier's financial situation is shaky, so aficionados will want to patronize the stomping grounds of local poets like Stephen Dobyns, Frank Bidart, Bill Knott and Jorie Graham.

CURTAINS IN TONES OF CURRY AND GINGER

Madura, at 144 Newbury St., sells beautiful curtains ready to hang. Call 617-267-0222 or go to www.madurahome.com.

Although the goods are made in France, this store is inspired by the deep, spicy colors of India. The ready-made curtains at Madura are sumptuously rich in thickness and style. You can snap them right onto your windows to bring mansion-hood to even a small apartment, and easily attached fixings further the look's sexiness. The curtains come in one long length (110 inches), and three widths (57, 78 and 137 inches), and you won't want to mini-skirt them; the Madura look requires that long swoopiness. The exotic style is enhanced by the attachments: straps, ribbons, golden hooks and dramatic twisty tassels that suggest a footman may be about to announce your visitors by blowing a horn. Yet these adornments are part of the do-it-yourself, no-decorator-needed ease. After you hang the curtains, you do minor hemming right under the window, using an ironing board and a special strip the store provides. Fabrics come in taffeta, jacquard, cotton and linens. Blackout curtains, interestingly, come in white. Ethereal sheers, sometimes rolled up with ribbons, filter the light in dreamy ways. Use them on side windows, or billow them over a bed.

EXPECTING: A SOOTHING MASSAGE

Massage therapist Ananda Lowe gives massages to women in any stage of pregnancy. Gift certificates available. At various Healthworks locations ($65 for members, $75 for nonmembers). Call 617-623-3883.

The inner and outer life of the pregnant woman is at times dreamy and abstract, but it's also busy with appointments, excitement and legitimate anxiety. A massage therapist and former doula—a trained assistant who provides support to women in labor—Ananda Lowe says that while a pregnant woman is preparing to give intensive nurture to her newborn, she needs some nurturing herself. Tension of body and soul can be lessened through the gliding, stroking and gentle kneading of a massage. As the little insidenik grows, the woman lies on this side, then that side, while her weight-burdened hips and lower back—even, if desired, the belly itself—receive attention. While the midsection is preparing its muscle tone for what Lowe calls "the job of a lifetime," the shoulders, gravitationally challenged by the growing belly, need massage attention, as does the area around the rib cage. Breathing can be restricted as the thin layers of muscle holding the torso together get a bit squished by the developing fetus; massaging the area helps. Come the big day, this detensification is in the bank as reference for the "relaxation response," that rehearsed-then-later-called-upon loosening of tension.

REVIEW

A NEAR-PERFECT UNION

Seth Woods' newest restaurant, Union Bar and Grille, is worthy of all the hype

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY BERTA A. DANIELS

The $10K tuna with grilled fennel, baby arugula and roasted-tomato vinaigrette

A selection of artisanal cheeses for two, with seasonal accompaniments and sorbet

Smoke-roasted double-thick pork chop with mustard shell beans, apple confiture and citrus pan juices

Rack of lamb with Jerusalem artichoke gratin, Tuscan kale and mission fig glaze

What's all the buzz about? In a city as full of good restaurants as Boston, why is it so difficult to score a table at a decent time at the Union Bar and Grille early in the week, and practically impossible to do so on weekends? After lucking out and getting the last available unreserved table at 7 pm one Monday, and settling for a 5:30 pm reservation the following Thursday—a dinner hour associated with early bird specials for Florida retirees—I found out. Union, the latest endeavor by Seth Woods (Aquitaine, Aquitaine Bis), is nothing short of superb, with chic, comfortable surroundings, spectacular food, informed and efficient—perhaps too efficient—service and remarkably reasonable prices.

How can you go wrong at a restaurant that starts your meal with a small black cast iron frying pan containing a round loaf of moist, rich yet light corn bread accompanied by sweet butter? Appetizers included mussels ($9), a shellfish I approach cautiously having encountered specimens of dubious provenance in the past. Not to worry here, for a baker's dozen of plump, sweet mussels were impeccably fresh and wholesome, simmered in white wine, parsley and butter with just enough garlic to enhance but not obscure their sweet flavor. Inexplicably, in a restaurant that does almost everything else well, the waiter failed to bring a receptacle—which the French call la poubelle de la table—for discarding the spent shells, and I was reduced to the expedient of piling them on my bread plate. Another seafood appetizer, smoked Menemsha bluefish with celery, walnut and apple salad ($8), arrived as two thin slices of pleasantly oily bluefish presented on an attractive square plate and dressed in a tangy horseradish mustard. The interplay between the tastes and textures of the walnuts, crisp celery and crunchy, sweet apples provided the perfect counterpoint for this rich, full-flavored fish.

Goat cheese and arugula salad with wood-grilled eggplant and oven-cured tomatoes ($9) provided a starter that was both refreshing and satisfying, with the warm Mediterranean flavors of the eggplant and goat cheese felicitously paired with pleasantly bitter greens including baby arugula and tingly frisée, all moistened with aromatic extra-virgin olive oil. The heartiest appetizer on the menu, boneless beef short ribs with honey-roasted root vegetables and celery slaw ($12), appeared as a small cylinder topped with crunchy celery slaw. The barbecue marinade rendered the beef sweet but not cloying, and the hearty beef flavor shone through.

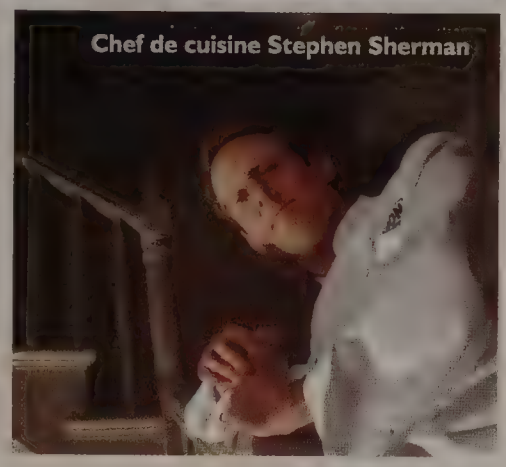
Finally among the starters, wild mushroom risotto ($14) was a triumph. Creamy in texture, with flavors ranging from exotic white truffle oil, woodsy black trumpet mushrooms and nutty, mellow Madeira wine, the risotto was served in unique, highly stylized bowls.



Moving to the main courses, I found the fish offerings exceptional. The $10K tuna with grilled fennel ($27) took first prize. The waiter explained that its name derives from an award that Union's chef de cuisine, Steve Sherman, won as a student at the Culinary Institute of America for designing the dry marinade used in preparing the fish. Made with fennel seed, coriander, ground black pepper and chili flakes, the marinade imparted marvelous flavors and aromas to the first-rate slab of sashimi-quality tuna. I ordered it rare and was charmed by its moist, satiny texture. It was topped by luscious fillets of roast tomatoes, whose balance between sweet and tart reminded me that tomatoes are properly classified as a fruit and not a vegetable. A second fish offering, wood-grilled swordfish steak ($25), was more simply spiced with salt and pepper, with rich earthy flavors provided by an accompanying hash of tiny cubes of sweet potatoes, small chunks of bacon and slices of Brussels sprouts, while a balsamic brown butter added an additional flavor kicker that married well with the mild fish.

Moving from sea to land, I enjoyed the roast chicken with andouille corn bread stuffing ($21). The chicken's moist flesh, crisp skin and provocatively spicy, salty dressing came with a dandy combination of garlicky greens and mildly sweet onions. Finally, the smoke-roasted double-thick pork chop ($22), a full two inches high, resembled a small loin of pork on the bone. Surprised that the waiter didn't ask how I wanted it prepared, I spoke up to say that I preferred it medium rare. Unfortunately, what arrived at the table was more gray than pink, and consequently dry and uninteresting. Whether Union applies an American as opposed to French standard in delineating between rare and medium, or adheres to my parents' prejudice that pork must be cooked well-done—or simply that the waiter forgot to communicate my preference to the kitchen—I could only guess. but despite my dissatisfaction with the pork's texture, I loved the garnish of large, dark mustard shell beans (resembling kidney beans), and long slices of delicious roast parsnips that accompanied it.

Chef de cuisine Stephen Sherman

Union's desserts almost blew me away. We chose the chef's dessert tasting for two ($18), a selection of four of the offered desserts in small portions. When the dish arrived, we counted five items, rather than four, arrayed on the attractive platter placed before us, leading me to conclude that I had been recognized and the house was showcasing the talents of its pastry chef, Joshua Steinberg. Regardless, each of the five was terrific. Chocoholic that I am, my favorite was the dark chocolate fondant, a rich, intensely flavored mousse garnished with burnt-sugar ice cream, mildly sweet Anjou pear and a tiny cashew pastry. A close second, the Vermont maple bread pudding with walnut praline and toasted marshmallow ice cream, seemed a whimsical play on the classic ice cream flavor, maple walnut, with toasted marshmallow ice cream thrown in for good measure. Pistachio-crusted brown sugar cheesecake was most memorable for its accompanying kalamansi lemon sorbet, exquisitely tart. The only problem with this array of delectable desserts was keeping them straight, and while I thoroughly enjoyed the banana split with butterscotch hazelnut fudge and black cherries and the white chocolate mousse Napoleon, by the time we worked our way through all five desserts and their garnishes, they had become hopelessly but enchantingly confused.

The stage on which Union's virtuoso kitchen performs is visually engaging and comfortable. Located in a double storefront on Washington Street across from the Cathedral of the Holy Cross, Union has a bar area to the left of the entrance, furnished with high tables at which full meals are served, and a good-sized dining room, accommodating perhaps 80 diners, to the right. A heavy wooden beam supports the ceiling and is itself supported by square beams vertically deployed as columns. Two large, black wrought iron chandeliers, shiny black leather banquettes and booths for four, six or eight, and long mirrors above the wainscoting create an upscale dining environment. Crisp, white tablecloths and napkins and a single votive candle dress tables set with substantial tableware and wineglasses.

Consistent with its reasonable food prices, Union offers an approachable wine list, with glasses priced as low as $6.50 and bottles beginning in the $20s. I found the Hahn Estates Central Coast cabernet sauvignon ($7/glass, $28/bottle), well structured, with good acid and a fine finish, to be a superb accompaniment to Union's food, whether fish, fowl, or meat.

If I had any criticism of Union, it was that the meal was served at a pace that at times seemed a trifle rushed. Not that the waiters hurried us, but they seemed to pounce and clear the plates the moment a fork was set down on the table, reappearing in an instant with the following course. In thinking about this phenomenon, I concluded that Union's value-priced menu, combined with the extraordinarily high quality of its food, made the brisk pace both understandable and tolerable. If tables can be turned over two or three times a night, prices can be kept reasonable while allowing a fair return for the restaurateurs. Fair enough. IB

DISH

When in Croma...

Bean there, done that...Salts shake-up...

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

When we heard that the Newbury Street site that housed the old Davio's would be the future home of an upscale British pizza franchise, we were less than thrilled. Oh joy. English pizza. According to the Web site for the original Croma in Manchester (England), the menu features such delights as "baked dough balls" and specialty pizzas with toppings like Peking duck, cucumber, plum sauce and mozzarella; bacon, "free-range" egg, sausage, mozzarella and tomato; and smoked haddock, leeks, lemon juice and crème fraîche.

Caffè Umbra's duck breast finished with coffee

Hold on, says Greg Nourjian, one of the partners in Croma, who describes himself as "kind of in charge of marketing and community relations." He's just returned from a month in the UK at the first Croma, and he assures us, "we're not going to have a fish pizza" in Boston. There will, however, be a Cajun chicken pizza.

"It's more of an entertainment concept," he says. "Basically gourmet pizzas, baked pastas and salads, with incredible decor, in a very comfortable, upscale environment." Slated to open in early May, Croma will be, according to Nourjian, "the coolest place for pizza and wine in Boston." We'll see. Sounds like the man's got a lot of baked dough balls.

SECOND COURSE

To bean or not to bean: Several columns ago, we noted that a Seattle restaurant was spotlighting steaks coated in Starbucks coffee grounds, and wondered if the trend would reach Boston. We've been informed that Caffè Umbra offered a "coffeed steak" on its menu last summer, specifically, "grilled hangar steak with warm portobello salad, eggplant fries, and espresso salt." Sorry to have missed it. But coffee is still on the main course menu, thanks to sous chef Adam Halberg's inspiration from a stint at Osteria Stallo del Pomodoro in Modena, Italy. Apparently, those coffee-craving Italians have been seasoning beef, duck, and venison with coffee beans in lieu of pepper for a while.

Umbra chef/owner Laura Brennan says she's currently featuring a slow-roasted duck breast accompanied by risotto dotted with Armagnac-soaked prunes and "finished with coffee." Specifically, French roast coffee. With caffeine, as nature intended. Has anyone ordered decaf risotto?

"It doesn't come that way," says Brennan firmly. If anyone asks, "we'll just say no. I'm 50; I say no."

She's also saying no—make that non—to the concept of a working vacation. Brennan plans to spend a week in Paris in April with three of her longtime best friends from cooking school, and she doesn't intend to cook. Instead, she says, "I'm going to walk around, smoke Gauloises and drink truffled Cognac at the Ritz." Très bien.

By the time you read this, Salts restaurant in Cambridge should be reopened. The new owners, chef Gabriel Bremer and general manager Analia Verolo, describe their menu as "contemporary American with French influence, featuring locally grown and naturally raised products."

Fluxing afresh: In the South End, two new chefs are behind the stove at Flux. Chris Moore and Alex McWilliams plan to add more variety to the menu, offering lots of daily specials to the usual fare of specialty pizzas, burgers, and other familiar comfort-food dishes. Also new: a skirt steak entrée, at $19 the most expensive dish on the menu...Flux Deluxe.

Until the end of March, the Massachusetts Film Bureau will benefit from your purchase of the unofficial Oscar dessert: the Salute to the Stars: Happily Ever After at Todd English's Bonfire. Word is, it's been nominated for Best Use of Chocolate in a Leading Role. IB

Performing Arts: That's Entertainment

Whereas most of us would give anything to make the first days of spring arrive sooner, the end of March is a sad, sad time for the city's die-hard cabaret fans. As March (Cabaret Month to aficionados) winds down, the nights of campy show tunes, wistful American standards and crazily colored feather boas grind to a halt. The Boston Cabaret Festival finishes off the month with a bang. Now in its third year, the show celebrates the New Great American Songbook with a night of contemporary songs ("contemporary" meaning from the past 20 years). The night features nine singers belting out ballads and humorous hits for three hours straight. Carver Ballroom of the Radisson Hotel, 200 Stuart St., Boston (508-652-9834). $30 advance, $40 the day of the show. 7 pm. www.bostoncabaretfestival.com.

Will McMillan joins a heap of other cabaret singers for the Boston Cabaret Festival.

Music: Ninja Tuneapalooza

So you're up on all the ambient hip-hop/blip-hop/glitch/dance/trance/laptop/IDM/trip-hop artists like the folks on Mo' Wax, Warp and Tigerbeat Records, right? Or did that last sentence just sound like a lot of gibberish? Either way, you'll be doing yourself a favor by checking out the Paradise March 17, when new DJs and old favorites from famed UK label Ninja Tune showcase their skills. DJ extraordinaire Kid Koala spins his usual tongue-in-cheek blend of everything from jazz to spoken word, pushing turntablism in strange new directions. But if he's too cerebral for you, Amon Tobin's hijinks on the ones and twos are guaranteed to move your caboose. Blockhead and Sixtoo are newcomers to the Ninja scene, but they each have solid resumes in avant/abstract hip-hop music. Both gents are highly regarded beatmakers for such underground rappers as Aesop Rock, cLOUDDEAD and other members of the Def Jux and Anticon crews. So if you're into hip-hop but not really into the ho's and the Humvees; if you like club music but don't dig the Cristal or Courvoisier, this lineup is right up your alley. 967 Comm. Ave., Boston (617-423-NEXT). 8 pm, $20, 18+.

Kid Koala and his Ninja Tune cohorts show off their skills at the Paradise.

Performing Arts: Luscious Laughter

Where would you expect to see a WWF wrestler–turned–stand-up comedian perform? The Wilbur Theatre? The Colonial? Nah, it makes much more sense that a two-time World Wide Wrestling Federation tag-team champion like "Luscious" Johnny Valiant should wow audiences at a down-and-dirty joint like the Good Time Emporium in Somerville. As pro wrestlers go, Valiant is ancient: five decades in the business. But this entrepreneurial guy who once managed Hulk Hogan hasn't let age slow his career. He's got a recurring role as a bodyguard on The Sopranos; he's been a play-by-play announcer, manager, guest referee and occasional wrestler for the WWF; and now he's a stand-up and improv artist. Traveling the country with his one-man show, Valiant has many stories to tell, and the evening also includes a meet-and-greet and autograph session with the star. Said online mag Slate of his performance: "He is funny, prowling the stage and using his graying, 240-pound frame as a comic prop." We're already amused. 30 Assembly Square Drive, Somerville. www.necwwrestling.com/valiant.htm. 7:30 pm. $10, $15 at the door.

CityScope: Green Day

It may seem sacrilegious to honor the patron saint of Ireland on a day other than March 17. But since the 17th is an arbitrarily chosen date—neither the birthdate of St. Patrick nor the date of his death—we don't see the problem. South Boston holds its annual St. Patrick's Day Parade on a weekend every year, no matter what day of the week the 17th falls on. This year the festivities take place on March 21, and by then, you'll have slept off your hangover and should be ready to paint the town green. The parade features the usual hoopla—marching and pipe bands, floats, color guards and Clydesdales. And this year is the 200th anniversary of the incorporation of Southie, Boston's most Irish of neighborhoods. So be prepared to party extra hardy pre- and post-parade. Begins at Broadway T Station (Red Line), ends at Andrew T Station, South Boston. 1 pm.

THROUGH SUN./APRIL 25

Performing Arts: Mateo and Mojitos

If your only experience with ballet is The Nutcracker, and you imagine that ballet is strictly for the fur-stole/three-piece-suit set, think again. José Mateo's Ballet Theatre attracts a decidedly younger, hipper crowd with its offerings. The latest, a cabaret-style show called The Cuban Condition, expresses the passion and energy of Cuban culture. Audience members sip cocktails at tables that offer a close-up view of the dancers. But here's the pièce de résistance: Attendees receive a complimentary mojito—a drink of rum, fresh mint, sugar and lime inspired by the sugar cane fields of Cuba—at select performances, courtesy of Bacardi. Sanctuary Theatre, 400 Harvard St., Cambridge (617-354-7467). www.ballettheatre.org. Fri. and Sat., 8 pm; Sun., 4 pm. Through April 25. $28.

Eternal Sunshine fails to enlighten

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind takes its title from a line in Alexander Pope's poem "Eloisa to Abelard," a lament to the pain of complicated love. It turns out the poem and the movie are a lot alike: Each has vivid flourishes, but it's hard not to get twisted up in knots while trying to follow along.

The movie is the latest mindbender written by Charlie Kaufman, who previously scripted Being John Malkovich, Human Nature and Adaptation (he also wrote the adapted screenplay for Confessions of a Dangerous Mind). Kaufman's stories are like M. C. Escher drawings in which you can't tell always tell which direction things are headed in, but you put your faith in the hope that Kaufman will get his characters to an interesting place. Sometimes you're rewarded, sometimes you're not.

Breaking up is hard to do for Jim Carrey and Kate Winslet in Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind

Like Human Nature, Eternal Sunshine bats around interesting ideas about the struggle between science and human urges, but the ride isn't nearly as involving, amusing, layered or cohesive as the metaphysical journeys in Malkovich or Adaptation. (Human Nature and Eternal Sunshine were directed by Michel Gondry, while Spike Jonze directed Malkovich and Adaptation. Coincidence?)

The premise this time marries the memory wipes of Paycheck and the memory-impaired romance of 50 First Dates. Eternal Sunshine opens with the meeting of high-strung Joel (Jim Carrey) and free-spirited Clementine (Kate Winslet) on a wintry Long Island beach. They hit it off and seem headed for romance. But it turns out this prologue is not the beginning of the story and is not even the first time the two have met. Although neither quite realizes it, they've already been through a romance together, but when it started to go stale, Clementine went to Lacuna Inc., where Dr. Howard Mierzwiak (Tom Wilkinson) and his staff (including Kirsten Dunst, Mark Ruffalo and Elijah Wood) wiped all memory of (and heartbreak over) Joel from her mind.

After the prologue, the action appears to jump ahead to some time after the couple has broken up, but you soon realize this action is really happening before Joel and Clementine's "meeting." That's when he discovers she had him wiped from her memory, and he's so astonished and hurt that he decides to have the same procedure done.

Here's where things get trickier. As Joel is having the procedure done—a process that involves lying in a bed, semiconscious, while a big metal helmet that's hooked up to a computer scours your brain for memories of the lover and then scrubs them away—he changes his mind about erasing Clementine. He tells this to Clementine in their encounters within his memory, and the two try to hide in unrelated memories, like those from Joel's childhood, so that they will remember to reconnect in reality.

These memories make for some amusing action, especially during a kitchen scene in which visual effects shrink Carrey down to proportion as boyhood Joel, or whenever Joel and Clementine run through memories that are literally vanishing around them as the computer wipes them away. But all this action makes for essentially a one-joke comedy, and despite the appealing chemistry between Carrey and Winslet, their characters aren't that special. In fact, they're close cousins to the neurotic guy and flaky woman from Along Came Polly.

There is another layer of action to Eternal Sunshine, involving the Lacuna staff. It's mildly amusing when Wood's character tries to woo Clementine by regifting the same items she loved when Joel gave them to her. And the fact that Dr. Mierzwiak and his receptionist (Dunst) are attracted to each other despite having gone through the memory wipe after a failed fling reinforces the battle between science and humanity. But this action often comes off like so much filler.

Repetition and filler can dampen even the most intriguing premise, and they do just that here. Kaufman's successes have created high expectations for his movies, yet Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind never climbs above so-so, absurd romantic comedy and into the twisted emotional philosophy of his better movies. Club Dread ★
This failed horror-comedy from the comedy troup that gave us Super Troopers is the perfect dat movie—for anyone who wants to break up in 10 minutes or less. It's hard to feel good about anyon or anything after sitting through this one. (A Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Dirty Dancing: Havana Nights ★★½
Compared with the shinola that's been hitting th aters lately, this sequel of sorts to the puzzlingly popu lar 1987 movie is actually a pleasant surprise. Set i late-1950s Cuba on the eve of Castro's revolution, offers another story about a "nice girl" (Romol Garai) who comes of age through hip-grinding dan ing and romance. In this case, it's the daughter of a American businessman who starts sweating th nights away with a local boy (Diego Luna), and h story is convincingly and solidly told. But adding a odd taste is the occasional presence of the original Patrick Swayze. You could snip out Swayze and th plot wouldn't be affected, and we're never even told he's playing the same character as in the original. (A Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Eurotrip ★★
Not horrible, but not good either, this melding Road Trip and National Lampoon's European Vacatio at least has the nerve to be R-rated, but it's litt more than a series of clichéd gags about Europea (oh look, soccer hooligans!). And it expects us root for its characters, but they're so clichéd th pulling for them is a difficult leap of faith to tak (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

50 First Dates ★½
What can you say about a movie set in Hawa with a predominantly reggae soundtrack? (Besid "Hawaii is 4,000 miles away from Jamaica!" ar "Not all music by darker people from island cu tures is interchangeable!") The dimwittedness tends far beyond the soundtrack, though. In th first 10 minutes alone, you get animal jokes, k jokes, the most telegraphed vomiting gag ev committed to film, an old guy who curses and R Schneider. After that opening, the rest of th movie doesn't stand a chance. It doesn't deser one, either. (At Boston Common, Fenway ar suburbs.)

The Fog of War ★★★
In Cambridge moviemaker Errol Morris' series interviews with former JFK and LBJ secretary of d fense Robert McNamara, the shrewd technocr doesn't unburden himself of any more responsib ity for the Vietnam quagmire that occurred und his watch. McNamara is too cagey for that. Morris finds fertile territory in McNamara's obse vations on human nature, war and politics. (Mor has subtitled the movie "Eleven Lessons from th Life of Robert S. McNamara.") When McNama talks about the Vietnam effort failing because th American government didn't know enough to e pathize with the Vietnamese, it's hard not to thi of Iraq. And when McNamara talks about th moral dilemmas of making decisions in times strife, he sheds light on all the political crossroa that have turned presidents' heads gray. More th a dry Q&A, Fog unfolds in Morris' typically cin matic style, featuring montages of archival footag cockeyed camera angles and Philip Glass' churni music. (At Kendall Square, Copley Place a Coolidge Corner.)

Good Bye Lenin! ★★½
A loyal East German goes into a coma just befo the Berlin Wall falls, and when she has to lead stress-free life after she comes to, her son goes great lengths to make sure she never knows that h Communist country doesn't exist anymore. Th great premise yields some amusing moments, b also some disappointing ones. Unlike in Bi Wilder's brilliant One, Two, Three (which cover similar territory after the wall went up), the come here never quite hits high gear because the sto tempers that comedy with shades of drama. But t characters' family drama never becomes as mem rable as the premise. (At Kendall Square.)

Hidalgo ★★★
It's not the most ambitious movie, but this 1890-adventure earns a lot of goodwill for its old-sch desire to please the average moviegoer, and not j a narrow demographic segment. This tale of American Pony Express rider who enters a pres gious long-distance horse race in the Arabi Peninsula with his trusty mustang is a small brea of fresh air. With an unassuming and appeali Viggo Mortensen as its hero, the movie packs in t Saturday-matinee exotic entertainment of The So pion King, though it doesn't shoot for humor often, and it conveys a bond between man and horse better than the heavy-handed Seabiscuit did. Although based on a true story, the desert adventure should be taken with a big grain of salt, especially since it turns out hero Frank T. Hopkins may have told a tall tale or two in his day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Intermission ★★★

Think of it as an Irish version of Scotland's Trainspotting. Sex, drugs and rockin' crime are the main sparks to this fiery comedy, which lights on fire when one foolish Dubliner (Cillian Murphy of 28 Days Later) dumps his dishy girlfriend (Kelly Macdonald of Trainspotting) "as a test," and she promptly moves on to a married man (Michael McElhatton). This dubious act causes a ripple effect that spills into the lives of the married man's wife (Deirdre O'Kane), a surly bus driver (Brian F. O'Byrne), a macho cop dying to be a celebrity (Colm Meaney) and even an out-of-control thief (Colin Farrell). The movie is never as wild again as it is in its opening scene, so there's a steady petering, but the dark comedy usually connects, and it never totally runs out of momentum. (At Copley Place, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Lord of the Rings: The Return of the King ★★

Peter Jackson has once again given us an expansive spoof of bombastic, middle-ages fantasy adventures: the furrowed brows, the swords and sorcery, the creatures, the hair extensions. Oh, that's right, the Oscar-winner isn't supposed to be silly. Jackson is obviously an imaginative, capable director, but after three movies and seven hours, I still don't care a lick about anything that happens to any of these solemn, solemn people. The LOTR trilogy epitomizes the sort of movies that win technical Academy Awards, but that no one takes seriously. Yet for reasons I just can't understand, a lot of folks have taken these seriously (come on, isn't Tolkien's attractive human heroes versus ugly orc villains plot just a tad juvenile?). Well, maybe now Jackson can go back to making interesting movies like Heavenly Creatures and Forgotten Silver. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Monster ★★

No matter how hard it tries, and no matter how successfully Charlize Theron transforms herself into less attractive, much rougher Aileen Wuornos—the prostitute executed by Florida for killing seven men—this docudrama isn't nearly as sympathetic or as interesting as Aileen Wuornos: The Selling of a Serial Killer, Nick Broomfield's decade-old documentary. In the docudrama, Wuornos is a much-abused woman who decides to try her luck with women after she meets a younger lesbian (Christina Ricci). But with no other way to make money, she keeps hooking, and after a john gets violent, she kills him in self-defense. Then she continues to kill. Although you feel her rage, the movie's Wuornos is a little too dumb to sympathize with (she keeps riding around in her victims' cars), and Theron fails to provide the spark that might make her more fascinating than stupid. The movie also puts all its emotional eggs in the basket of the doomed lesbian affair—which fails to be the riveting tragedy writer-director Patty Jenkins wants it to be. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and suburbs.)

My Architect ★★★

Much like last year's The Stone Reader, Nathaniel Kahn's new film is documentary as compelling quest. Kahn's mission is to learn more about his father, architect Louis Kahn. The elder Kahn died in 1974, when Nathaniel was a boy, and it turns out he had three families that he juggled. (He remained married to the same woman, while fathering children with two others.) The movie's drama is in its depiction of someone who was world-class in his field, yet whose personal life was a farce. The filmmaker struggles to understand how his mother and Louis Kahn's other families could tolerate such a situation, as he, like them, expresses his love for the man. With no easy answers, Kahn is left to look for answers in his father's work, a search that takes him from Philadelphia to Bangladesh. (At Coolidge Corner and Kendall Square.)

The Passion of the Christ ★½

What's more creepy—to watch one man beaten to a literal pulp for half of Mel Gibson's Jesus movie or to realize that the movie is more about Christ's scars than his teachings? It's a toss-up, but they're the sort of things that keep the movie from being genuinely dramatic (the cheesy slo-mo moments don't help, either). You have to admire Gibson as a producer for doing it his way—on his own nickel, in subtitled Aramaic and Latin—but as a director he gets little across except violence, right up to the money shot of blood squirting from Jesus' hands as they're nailed to the cross. Also, this is the Lord of the Rings/Harry Potter Bible movie: If you haven't read the book three times, it's not going to fill in any of the details for you. Consequently, most of the potentially "controversial" elements are too murky to change a general audience's views on anything, since the relationship between the Jews and the Romans and the relationship between Jesus and the Jewish leaders remain unclear. In fact, if you're just an average moviegoer who can't quote scripture, but is just looking for a good story, this plodding ode to martyrdom was not made for you. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Stephen Chow plays a Shaolin kung fu disciple who forms a soccer team in Shaolin Soccer.

Shaolin Soccer ★★½

This Chinese import is one odd movie—how many other comedies could have had their release as an English-dubbed family film scrapped in favor of a smaller release as a subtitled art film? Hong Kong action star Stephen Chow (The God of Cookery) plays a Bruce Lee–loving Shaolin kung fu disciple who gathers a soccer team made of his former martial arts classmates and enters a lucrative tournament. The comedy is an odd combination of special effects and vaudeville-style slapstick. To add to the film's oddity, sometimes it's cringingly unfunny, while at other times it's clever, tongue-in-cheek and very funny. It's like a live-action cartoon, and the airborne soccer matches have little to do with the earthbound version the Revolution plays. Despite the change in its U.S. release, however, it remains mostly kids' stuff. (At Kendall Square.)

Starsky & Hutch ★★★

I never had any desire to see Starsky & Hutch on TV. But with Ben Stiller and Owen Wilson in the title roles and the action played intentionally for laughs, I was there. And I was rewarded. The two stars bring just the right daffy charm to the buddy-cops—one intense, the other laid-back—as the partners go after a smug cocaine kingpin (Vince Vaughn). You get Tab, muscle cars, afros, Jewfros, tube socks, disco, freedom rock, Rhoda head scarves and other 1970s cheese while S & H prowl the mean streets of Bay City with the help of Huggy Bear (Snoop Dogg). Think of The Brady Bunch Movie with guns. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Mark Erelli brings snappy western swing to the folk scene

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

A background in insect biology—specifically population dynamics of the gypsy moth—doesn't provide the usual training to become a folksinger. But for Reading native Mark Erelli, a onetime graduate student in biology, it was par for his course.

"Like many parents of their generation, my parents hoped that I'd grow up to be a doctor or lawyer," says Erelli, 29, whose parents are both local schoolteachers. "Just as soon as they got used to the idea of me being a biologist, I said, 'Well, you know what? Now I think I want to be a folksinger.'

Mark Erelli's unique style is gaining attention on the folk circuit

"Biology would have been no more of a sure bet or economically profitable than folk music," he says from a tour stop outside New York. "Both require long hours in remote places away from your friends and family."

Nonetheless, six years in the folk trenches have paid off for Erelli, who has developed into one of the region's most respected new singer-songwriters. The twist is that he turned that corner with a sound evoking western swing bands of the '30s and '40s on his fourth CD, Hillbilly Pilgrim.

"I always had this love of country music," he says. "I've always had some [western swing] songs in my set that I've written. I can only assume that from assimilating a bunch of different influences, it just came out. But one thing I noticed when I played these songs: people would be smiling and tapping their feet, which is about as rowdy as it gets in a coffeehouse."

Erelli traces his influences from New England blues-folk heroes Chris Smither and Bill Morrissey to Texan singer-songwriters Guy Clark, Joe Ely and Butch Hancock. "Their country music roots are much more on display," he says. "It's not a stretch at all to go from someone like Butch Hancock to Hank Williams." Or, in turn, to discover Hank Thompson and Bob Wills, two pioneers of western swing.

"It's definitely not what some people would expect to come out of Boston, but we've got so much great country music," Erelli says. "Any given night of the week you can usually go to some bar for free and see some of the best musicians anywhere. We have as good a scene as the more nationally known Americana scenes like Nashville and Austin."

Accordingly, Hillbilly Pilgrim owes much of its authentic sound to backing players from local western swing outfit the Spurs, whose steel guitarist Frankie Blandino was the first musician Erelli tapped for the more purebred project. "Using those guys was like importing chemistry," he says. "It sounds really natural because it is really natural for them.

"I was really serious about making music that stood up to the other stuff in that tradition," says Erelli, who performs with the Spurs at Sanders Theatre March 26, on a bill with Richard Thompson. It's an annual benefit concert for Club Passim, where Erelli returns May 8 for a solo gig.

"I had songs to make a much more serious folk record," he says. "But the other tack was to go back to the way that western swing was originally used, which was essentially dance music to let people forget about their troubles for awhile, coming out of the Depression. So I think it's a great time to bring that aspect of the music back."

Hillbilly Pilgrim sports the occasional slow tune like "My Best Was Just Not Good Enough (For You)" and "The Farewell Ball," a waltz about the last days of Enfield, Mass. (one of the towns torn down to make way for the Quabbin Reservoir in the 1930s).

But snappy numbers with clever wordplay dominate the disc. Erelli references his wife in "Brand New Baby" (which talks about meeting her "on the farm"—code for one folk festival), "Let's Make a Family" and "Troubadour Blues." The last also takes a jab at the president over job insecurity.

"The usual benchmark that people measure folksingers by doesn't apply, because nobody thinks of grand philosophical revelations in western-swing lyrics," Erelli says. "I found I could be much more personal and say things that I would think twice of saying in a folk song. It all sounds so fun and harmless, and it's easier to critique the president on the sly, or to talk about my desire to have a family."

Erelli's fans should just be glad that when he was finishing his graduate biology studies at UMass-Amherst in the late '90s, he was also catching a different kind of bug on the folk scene in Northampton, where he launched his career.

"A lot of times, people would ask me, 'Have you written any songs about bugs yet?'" remembers Erelli. "At the time, I said, 'No, I don't like to mix work and pleasure.'" iB

7½ Club

We are seven and a half single women (the half is single half the time). While discussing why not one of us has found a man who isn't married or emotionally available, we came up with the 7½ Club. What is it? It is a group of seven and a half women who are in search of someone dateable. Since we haven't succeeded in our search solely, we are joining forces to find some dateable men! We range from all ethnicities and backgrounds, so there is a wide variety to choose from. From administrative geniuses to marketing gurus we are all different but in search of the same thing. Our first official appearance will be Thursday, April 15th, right after work at Aqua. We will be easy to find since we'll be dressed in our "official 7½ Club" shirts. As we sip martinis and decide on our next appearance location, we will be awaiting any curious bystanders. Come talk with us, have a drink. Your chances are at least one in 7½...

Angela

Guess who's writing this message to you? It's Charlie. It has been so long since the very last day we saw each other, which happened to be my last day at the mail room at your dorm. That is close to being five years ago. I just thought I would say hi. I feel silly, but if you see this, e-mail me.

—Peace2021@aol.com

Three chance meetings in a month (at the office, on the Orange Line and at Brandy Pete's) turned into five years of planned ones (Mount Washington Hotel, Duval Street, the Vineyard, Buckingham Palace, Eiffel Tower, Times Square, Grand Cayman, etc.). Then it all fell apart. We're both very different now, but somehow I can't shake all that the future might have in store for us and all the places and experiences that await us. Fate struck three times, let's control our fate from now on. The question is whether this is the chance meeting that bridges our past with all that is still to come.

My Own Bad Luck

That's what I created on Friday the 13th. As soon as I walked into Flat Top Johnny's, I spotted you playing pool with your friends and was smitten. A co-worker mentioned that he caught you giving me a long look. Skeptical, I glanced up, and sure enough, our eyes locked. You have blond hair, a beautiful smile and were wearing a light green sweater and dark jeans. I have brown hair and was sporting a gray turtleneck with two blue stripes across the chest. Unfortunately, I had to leave and couldn't figure out a way to say hi without seeming inappropriately forward. Let's give those furtive glances the fitting follow-through they deserve.

Symphony Whole Foods

It was the eve of Friday the 13th. We were, according to you, two "silly" girls, minding our own business and perusing the frozen foods section for a snack. You, Mr. Harassment, with your female friend and food selections in tow, decided to take it below the belt. Granted, we were carrying 44 rolls of toilet paper (twofers on 24 packs at CVS), but even still, we deserved dignity and privacy. We did not need you to point out our 44 rolls. Furthermore, we did not need you to inquire the fiber content of the brownies we were carrying. And it didn't stop there. You continued with a barrage of nonsensical comments. Never have we been so embarrassed, and we don't embarrass easily! We love Whole Foods and their their worldly food selections; however, you are one exotic flavor that left us feeling more than a little bit nauseous! Excuse us while we go put those 44 rolls to use!

Although you hate to admit that we came to know each other by spending $25.95 on a Match.com subscription, it was the best $25.95 you ever spent, and I will forever be thankful that I replied to your message. The past two years have been an adventure; between the long distance, the "baggage" and the countless other hurdles we faced, we are finally on that road to "forever." I hope that we'll be in our rocking chairs years from now, still arguing over UConn and UNC basketball games. Two years down, hopefully 70 more to go! Happy Anniversary...I love you.

Lost Starbucks Valentines

It was around 6 pm on Valentine's Day. I was waiting to pick up my Grande Nonfat Caramel Macchiato at the Copley Place Starbucks, and when my drink was called up we both reached for it at the same time. You were two people ahead of me in line, and I didn't realize we ordered the same drink. You were tall with green eyes, dark brown hair down to your neck and clean shaved. Your outfit consisted of black shoes, black pants and a gray shirt underneath a black jacket. You had a European look to you and you spoke with what seemed like an English accent. As we both reached for the drink you pulled away and asked if it was nonfat, and I replied with a smile "Yes, did you get the same drink?" You had the most amazing smile and said "Yes, but you take this one," and as I left I regret not asking you to join me. I am of average height, slim, dark blue eyes, straight dark brown hair with a hint of red down to my shoulders. I was wearing a black skirt, black boots and a white FCUK shirt. If you remember me and want to share a drink, e-mail me.

In response to "To the Raging Idiot at Fenway Bread and Circus"

Whoever wrote that Impersonal, I feel your pain! That crazy man stalked me at the Buck a Book at Downtown Crossing, used the same lame-ass lines and accused me of being racist as well. What a loser! Who is this guy? Ladies, beware of the raging idiot, not that his charms would even work on you anyway.

—Feeling like a freak magnet

Tired

I am tired of being used by you. You say we are friends, but that usually means me giving you money. I'm done supporting whatever bad habits you are into. You need to get yourself in rehab and stop begging your friends to give money. You had a decent job and apartment and now you're ruining your life. Maybe if more of us say no you'll get the help you need.

A Blu Egg Blu

Our eyes met across a sea of people at a place we weren't supposed to be. Your smile, eyes, or something I found invigorating. The first dinner and the chase back to my place, was the tide in the ocean of our relationship. We covered this country coast to coast, event to event. Your scent, your touch, your presence is intoxicating. You are my drug and I am going through withdrawal. Together we were one, apart I am none. Best friends forever, when did "I love you" lose meaning? You were the water that nurtured my mind, body and soul. At least we'll have the cannoli dance, or one day we'll meet up to do the hanky panky. I pray that one day God puts us back together again. Until then, this egg is blue.

rockie horoscope

MARCH 17 – 30, 2004

ARIES MARCH 20–APRIL 19

Mercury's move into truth-seeking Aries doesn't guarantee that you've become a mental giant, only that you'll try to express yourself more honestly and that you'll take liberties with the language that you normally wouldn't. Writers, freed from their concern about the aftermath, dare to say what they think. This newfound verbal acuity accelerates after your courageous Mars ruler joins the Gemini dialectic imperative on the 20th. Coupled with the Aries new moon, the timing for a brand new project couldn't be better.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

Joy to the world! The happiness and good fortune that you feel are your due are due when your affable Venus ruler and generous Jupiter's trine. Because both "benefics" are in realistic, down-to-earth signs, you won't be tempted to run up enormous bills should you decide to share the bounty you're being blessed with. And share you should. Just be careful that you don't romanticize a situation that hasn't been decided one way or the other. Wishful thinking is just that: wishful. Rational thought doesn't enter this picture.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

You may think you're simply being realistic and acting like a sane, sensible person. But if you've been depressed for a while—your Mercury ruler is temporarily being dragged down by worrisome Saturn—consider discussing your options with someone you respect. Mercury traveling through fiery Aries suggests that you should be full of piss and vinegar and rarin' to go. But if the impetus (or, if need be, an actual reason) to shake things up at work doesn't come by the new moon on the 20th, see a headhunter.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Don't be surprised if a client or your employer (especially the Boss Lady) dangles a carrot in front of your nose. This is one of those rare interludes when the Moon Child can do no wrong, when goodies, like manna, seem to float down from heaven. Since you know the favoritism won't last forever, make the most of the opportunities that are dropped on you, especially during the enterprising Aries new-moon cycle. Although it's an annual occurrence, this year you're in far better shape to see things through to their successful conclusion.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Another joint financial matter could take wing with the Aries new moon on the 20th, so be sure to finish whatever business from the February new moon is still on your plate before it turns sour. Getting rid of stuff you no longer need and feelings that are festering is utterly appropriate, and the right thing to do whenever your sun ruler challenges anal-retentive Pluto. That this round of closet cleaning comes as the solar year ends is a prime example of synchronicity, but for a Leo sun-worshipper, it may also become a religious ritual.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

Set your sights on achieving a purely pleasurable objective, something easy, lusty and luscious that'll enhance your appearance and sweeten your disposition. It might not seem like a major accomplishment, but while lovable Venus favors expansive Jupiter in your sign, it—no matter what "it" turns out to be—can be a very big thing. Certainly big enough to lift you out of the doldrums and ease the anxiety you might have about a work assignment or a physical condition. Now is also a good time to try your luck.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Like your Virgo neighbors, you're in an excellent position, plus the timing is right, to test your luck. While your Venus ruler receives Jupiter's blessing for St. Patrick's Day, be sure to celebrate whatever windfall you do get, courtesy of a colleague, with friends and loved ones. Unlike Mama Lion Martha Stewart, you won't have to go to court. However, at the Aries full moon, something quite unexpected regarding a partner or co-worker might occur that'll make you question what you thought was a given.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

While you're not directly in line to benefit from the fortunate liaison between lucky Jupiter and loving Venus, your partner is. Stay on the best of terms; you may need a staunch ally and a few creature comforts if your impulsive Mars co-ruler causes trouble when it rubs a family member the wrong way. Mars in dualistic Gemini tends to incite rebellion in the ranks and debates in the dining room. Until they actually occur, why not pursue a physically pleasurable activity you can call your own?

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

It's possible that the rewards due you might not be as massive as you deserve. Nonetheless, try to be gracious when sociable Venus and your magnanimous Jupiter ruler support each other's best intentions. Even if they don't come up to your expectations, good things always flow from this favorable trine. Besides, with spring just around the corner, can a whirlwind love affair be far behind? Perhaps your oldie but goodie main squeeze will get all fired up once passionate Mars enters your Gemini marriage house on the 20th.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

Even a reclusive Goat can benefit from the fortunate connection that beautiful Venus and lucky Jupiter make as they travel through the other earth signs. If your birthday is in December, you could be heading toward a foreign country or flirting madly with one of its natives. If you were born in January, a handsome check to improve your surroundings or to help out a relative may already be in the mail. And while your spirits might not soar very high at the spring equinox, you know something always changes when the seasons change.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

Aren't you the sitting duck? Watch out that you don't get swept away by your vivid imagination and willingness to believe whatever romantic notion is currently passing your way. While irresistible Venus tests gullible Neptune in your sign, take a time-out to count the ways you can lose your head. But if an intelligent Aquarius doesn't mind forfeiting the right to claim "I am a rational human being!" then dive in and relish every sensuous thrill you can experience—and a few you can only imagine. Take notes, draw pictures.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Read for Aquarius. Once again, the two signs are facing similar situations. Except that Fish rarely claim to be rational beings, nor do you mind diving head first into seductive, escapist romantic experiences. However, and this is merely a warning, an unusual situation could become somewhat dangerous by the end of the month. That's when explosive Uranus in your sign is challenged by an angry and abusive Martian figure. Some find this outburst exciting, some, terrifying. As new business owners, making a choice in advertising avenues is a difficult decision. Regardless of the size of your advertising budget, you must be selective in choosing the medium that best reaches your target audience. At The Bustonian, we researched many avenues that appeared to be "Win-Win" situations, but when it came decision time, we chose to focus on the Improper Bostonian. Over the past few months, we've established a strong relationship with our Improper representative, Katie Schmidt, who has really helped us get the best response possible from our advertising dollars!!! We've found the entire Improper staff to be extremely nice and helpful. All in all, we're very pleased with the revenue that The Improper Bostonian has helped generate for our new business and we highly recommend investing in the Improper to work for you!!!

Terry Regan, winner of the dubious honor of being mentioned in this column, at the Crystal Ball.

EMPLOYEES OF THE IRS—READ NO FURTHER...

If the bartenders for private functions at the Four Seasons had bothered to consult a fortune-teller, they would have known that the Crystal Ball was going to be an all-hands-on-deck kind of affair.

A black-tie benefit for the Steppingstone Foundation, it attracted 500 bright young things hell-bent on having a good time, among them: philanthropic fun couples Mike and Betsy Danziger and Mike and Christine Savage; hip marrieds Alex and Lisa Pierpont; Doug and Val Fleishman; and Tommy and Carolyn Loucas; and smashing young singles Jed Raymond and Terry Regan.

In between sweating to the tunes of funk masters Eye to Eye and imbibing with abandon, guests bid wildly on a silent auction that included such items as first-class jaunts to Hawaii and Venice, which helped raise an estimated $80,000. The astounding sum of $130 came from one of the people mentioned above, who paid for the dubious distinction of being mentioned here in bold-face.

Note to my accountant: Does that qualify as a tax-deductible contribution?

IT'S AN HONOR JUST TO BE INVITED, PART I...

As far as bloated spectacles go, few provide as good an excuse for throwing a black-tie party as the Academy Awards. All that bugle-beaded, histrionic silliness inspires some of us to shimmy into eveningwear and go out carousing, as if the movie business needed our help in congratulating itself.

In Boston, the glitziest Oscars party was the 13th annual Massachusetts Movie Awards Gala, held amid the gilded splendor of the Wang Center, to raise money for the Massachusetts Film Bureau. In addition to live broadcasts of the goings-on in Hollywood, it boasted a sumptuous smorgasbord of food, copious quantities of alcohol and plenty of stars of its own.

A partial list of the glitterati: Mystic River actors Kevin Chapman and Tommy Guiry with Sean Penn's right-hand man, Tyrel Ventura (in town visiting his father, wrestler-turned-statesman Jesse, who's following up his stint as Minnesota's governor with a teaching gig at Harvard); producer-screenwriter-and-father-to-be Jimmy Cummings, with his magnificent wife, Jennifer; car dealer gazillionaire Ernie Boch, Jr. (who picked up the tab for the evening); star of the large and small screens Neal McDonough (the evening's honoree), with his glamazon bride, Ruvé; Stuck On You producer Kris Myer; acting-clan member Robert Wahlberg (representing bros Donnie and Mark); Melrose Place hottie John Enos; White Shadow star Ken Howard; and studly Boston Bruins Hal Gill, Mike Knuble, P.J. Axelsson and Brian Rolston with their luscious wives.

Everyone partied heartily while paying sporadic attention to the awards, which—surprisingly—didn't offer the evening's most memorable moment. Instead, that came during the live auction, when auctioneer Bob McDonough tried to shame all the big spenders in the room into beating Cheers owner Tom Kershaw's high bid on a package that included two round-trip first-class tickets to anywhere that American Airlines flies.

"Hey, Ernie Boch," McDonough shouted, "You can top that!" to which Boch responded apologetically, "Thanks, but I have my own jet."

IT'S AN HONOR JUST TO BE INVITED, PART II...

Meanwhile, the official Oscar Night America Party, a fund-raiser for the breast-cancer charity the Ellie Fund, took place amid the subterranean fabulousness of Saint.

Before the major awards were announced, the evening had taken on the vaguely louche atmosphere of Vanity Fair's legendary post-Oscars bash, with glamorous-looking couples canoodling on the dimly lit banquettes and celebutantes drinking heavily at the bar.

Present and accounted for: organizer Zvi Cole, and the Ellie Fund's founder, Jeff Popkin; Fidelity glamazon Eldene Amilcar; Newbury Street salon god William George; Dr. Kelly Carden; Clear Channel panjandrum Sara Berkowitz; sudsy babe Michelle Sullivan of Sam Adams; supersmoothies Alex Peselman and Josh Fishbein; snack food executive Lindsey Nickerson; PR stud Chris Haynes; interior designer and onetime object of Oscar-nominee Alec Baldwin's affection, Suzanne Logan; an Austin Powers impersonator pinching people's behinds; and, outside, a red-headed Joan Rivers wannabe interviewing guests as they arrived on the red carpet, while faux paparazzi and autograph seekers crowded the sidewalk.

By the time the Best Picture award rolled around, it was way past everyone's bedtime, and the crowd began to disperse with the dawning realization that tomorrow was Monday, and unlike movie stars, most of us had more to do than return borrowed diamonds to the jeweler and recover from our hangovers. TOASTS OF THE TOWN

When the IMPROPER published its first Beloved Bartenders issue, in 1995, the 56-page publication was printed on newsprint stock, and aside from the cover, its pages were largely black-and-white. The IMPROPER has changed and grown a lot since then, but our reverence for the city's most skilled and charming bartenders hasn't waned, and this year we present our 10th annual Boston's Beloved Bartenders issue.

These days, the contest attracts about 1,000 nominations from readers in praise of their favorite drinks slingers. In the winners' circle this year, you'll find pros with decades of experience as well as youngsters who've quickly earned a following. Some of the city's all-stars—like Eddie Doyle of Cheers, who appeared on our cover in 1995—have been elevated to our Most Valuable Bartenders list. Long may they reign.

Our first bartenders issue, published in 1995

In celebration of these and all the men and women whose presence behind the bar makes our lives a little happier, we'll be hosting our annual Bartenders Party on April 26, starting at 6 pm, at the Rack in Faneuil Hall. Stop by to see the mixing contest and toast your favorites.

THE RIGHT STUFF

As a child of the '80s and teen of the '90s, I appreciated last week's interview and photo spread of Joey McIntyre (March 17). While his good looks may draw people to the cover, the inside fashion spread and interview were even better. The clothes were perfect for him, and the interview was a good update on his life, without going overboard like a bad edition of "Where Are They Now?"

Thanks for a great issue, I look forward to more.

MORE FROM MEN

I was thrilled to see your issue "for men" (March 3), as it seems like there are an inordinate number of spa and bridal issues, but I was disappointed to find this issue to be soft. I understand that your core contingent in Boston pride themselves in their refined and intellectual ways. This does not mean, though, that we are vying to understand what women desperately need in the bedroom, or how to make better pasta. I grew up in the city of big shoulders, where men are men and women, well, they understand that their men need to spend the weekend at the cabin "sledding" with their boys, or tinkering with their motorcycle (thank you, Michelle). Believe it or not, we actually know how to make our women happy and would have enjoyed an issue dedicated to endeavors a bit more manly. Tell Ezra to keep up the good work—his page is usually the best of the bunch.

IN A NASTIER VEIN

I'm happy to hear about men with the same problems as women (Ezra, March 17)! Sorry, life sucks like that. But since I'm a 28-year-old female who started getting my own lovely varicose veins in college, not only can I relate, but it's nice to know I'm not alone out there.

I used to think men would think they were ugly and it would be a reflection on me, but when I thought about getting them "plucked out," somehow they didn't seem too bad. So life is what it is and it's unfair and all, but what are you going to do? At least Ezra has less of a chance at getting more of them because of pregnancy! Thanks for the column. It made me laugh and feel like we should all form a support group.

A MODERN TWIST

Gone are the days of the down-and-dirty bowling alleys, the lovably divey, flourescent joints where everything is covered with a layer of grime. In Boston, the Milky Way and Kings have ushered in the hip bar–meets–bowling phenomenon over the past few years. Now, Lucky Strike Lanes, a "bowling lounge" above the Jillian's playpen, has joined the bowling comeback. The glitzy 25,000-square-foot space follows on the heels of two other Lucky Strike Lanes, in California, and the chain is set to open seven other locations around the country. The Boston location opens for business April 9 (the day of the Red Sox' home opener), and the owners hope to strike upon the kind of cachet that Lucky Strike Hollywood has built up—celebs like Ashton Kutcher, Gwen Stefani and Cameron Diaz have been spotted on the lanes there. "Once you see stars in Hollywood bowling, people say, 'It's OK to bowl now, it's not square,'" says co-owner Kevin Troy.

Jillian's regulars will notice that the pool tables that used to be on the third floor are now on the second level (displacing the arcades), to make room for the couch-filled lounge and 16 bowling lanes. "It's not your typical big bowling center of the '50s and '60s," says Troy. "They lacked intimacy." Lucky Strike Lanes comes with all the modern bells and whistles: automatic scoring, a DJ on weekends and a giant video projection screen behind the pins. Bowling purists will be happy to note that dining options haven't been glammed up—comfort food like Buffalo bites, burgers, pizzas and calzones are the name of the game. So how will it stack up against the city's other new-age alleys? "There's room for all of us," says Troy. 11 am–2 am daily. $4.50 per game daytime; $5.95 evenings. 21+ after 8 pm. 145 Ipswich St., Boston (617-437-0300). —E.H.

Lucky Strike Lanes will look like the LSL in Hollywood.

MR. TEE

You've seen the hawkers around Fenway in recent years, offering T-shirts that denigrate the New York Yankees in a variety of colorful ways (speculation on Derek Jeter's sexual orientation being one of the more popular subjects). This year, Chris Wrenn, the man behind the Ts, has organized the street forces into Sully's Tees, a company offering all manner of New York– (and L.A.–) bashing apparel at Newbury Comics and through SullysTees.com. Wrenn has added some timely new designs, from the catchy "Killin' with Schillin'" to the succinct "A-Rod Is an A-Hole." Of course, there are some more-positive messages, such as "This Is Our Year" and "Boston K Crew," but personally, we're sending a "Drink Beer and Fight" shirt to Karim Garcia. —Ezra Dyer

FOR LOVE OR MONEY

When we came across a book in a Tiffany blue cover with a large emerald cut diamond ring on the front, titled How to Marry Money, we were intrigued, to say the least. Someone finally published a how-to for unabashed gold diggers? Yup. The author, Boston native Kevin Doyle, plays down the gold-digging angle, calling the book "a guide for women interested in pursuing a financially rewarding marriage." (Who isn't?). Nonetheless, it's filled with tips on finding out which men have the dough and getting them down the aisle. We chatted with Doyle to get a head start on his tips, before his book hits the shelves on April 27.

IB: Do you classify yourself as rich?
KD: Well, comfortable.
IB: So this is pretty much a book for gold diggers. I guess you would say there's nothing wrong with that?
KD: If nothing else I can assure you it's going to be an entertaining read. If you want to characterize me as the king of shallow pursuits, that's your prerogative, but I wouldn't approach it from that angle.
IB: Well, it is titled How to Marry Rich. Is it supposed to be tongue-in-cheek?
KD: It's ambiguous. You can take it either way. It's however you choose to apply it. Anything you can use to learn more about yourself is valuable. I'm a successful and accomplished human being. Most of the people I have associated with all my life have been, too. I belong to clubs. My career has been up and down a few times, but I've had an honest eye. I try to associate with winners, and I encourage other people to as well.
IB: What's the biggest mistake a person can make when trying to land a rich mate?
KD: If there's a single mistake, I suppose it would be [being] a deliberately calculating, crafty [person]. They tend to be dangerous people. I would steer clear of craftiness and conniving.
IB: Where are the best places in Boston to meet rich people?
KD: You go where they go. The golf clubs, tennis clubs. There's not a lot of losers at the ballet or the opera or the museum or the symphony. I will say, in my experience, people on Newbury Street tend to be maxed on the credit cards, while people on Charles Street tend to have bank accounts that are stuffed. But there are phonies and the real thing wherever you go.
IB: What's the most ideal kind of money to marry? Old money, new money, self-made man?

KD: It depends. A wealthy man who owns a string of dry cleaners could have so much more refinement than a person who has tons of old money. The self-made man tends to have more energy than the man who inherited. So which one do you want? Sometimes you should judge people on their overall score.
IB: Is love a factor in this at all, or is it just money money money?
KD: It's a lot easier to fall in love with someone who's financially secure. If you fall in love with someone who's unsuccessful, that says a lot about you. Even in the animal kingdom, animals don't look to mate until they get food and shelter.
IB: Is there a difference in strategy if you're trying to land a rich man vs. a woman?
KD: I think the principles for success are the same for men and women. There's no formula to follow—do A-B-C and then you'll have whatever. If you set the table for opportunity, you improve the odds of success. You put out the welcome mat for victory, and you have a better chance of victory arriving.

WORLD'S LARGEST COD PIECE

Big Fish...A hearty helping of fish and chips has been a long-time favorite at the Black Rose in Faneuil Hall. But on March 15, the pub outdid itself, teaming with seafood manufacturer Icelandic USA to beat the Guinness record for "World's Largest Fish and Chips Serving." Edging out the existing record of 71.99 pounds with a whopping 77.75-pound serving required the Black Rose to bring in a health inspector, an official from the City of Boston Division of Weights and Measures, a custom-made fryer and lots of hungry lunch-time customers. "Everything smelled deep-fried," says manager Paula Kent, adding that the 34-pound cod "was 30 years-old, I believe." We're guessing that with its champion cod safely in the record books, the Black Rose no longer has bigger fish to fry. 160 State St. (617-742-2286).

Politically Starved... It's not exactly a scientific method, but the folks at Mr. Dooley's Boston Tavern are having a bit of fun with the Political Burger Poll. The pub is keeping tabs on the popularity of two of its menu items: the Bush Burger (Texas prime beef, Tabasco sauce and cheddar.) and the Kerry burger (prime aged Black Angus steak with garlic and parsley butter, described in a press release as "rich and stately, but still a favorite of the common man"). Meant to spark conversation about the beef between Republicans and Democrats, manager Pat McCormack explains, the burgers can stoke the fires of political controversy between diners. So far, McCormack says, Kerry is "pipping the post," which translates to being very far ahead. Patrons are just eating it up. 77 Broad St., Boston (617-338-5656).

Chef's Surprise... Not everyone has fallen prey to HBO's stranglehold on Sunday nights. Tony Maws, chef/owner of Craigie Street Bistrot, has been putting a spin on Sunday dinners with his Chef's Whims specials. For the menuless, four-course prix fixe dinner ($29.99 per person), diners arrive after 9 pm and surrender themselves to the chef's culinary impulses. Maws says he wanted to let loose on Sunday nights by creating different dishes for different tables. Guests needn't fear they're getting leftovers. "One common misconception is that I'm cleaning out my fridge on Sunday nights. No way," he says. "I order up [food] for Sunday night, it's four courses, each guest, and we rock." 5 Craigie Circle, Cambridge (617-497-5511). www.craigiestreetbistrot.com.

Good Press... How does warm, crisp flattened bread plumped with fillings like marinated pork with chipotle aioli and pepper jack cheese sound? Or how about sopressata salami and provolone on Parmesan focaccia? Pressed Sandwiches, a new downtown café, doles out these and other delectable panini (all also available unpressed or in a low-carb version), along with soups, salads and other options ($5–$6.50) Mon.–Fri. What's more, you can wash down your meal with a cup of Terroir Coffee, roasted by George Howell, former owner of the much missed Coffee Connection. Beats the sad, soggy sandwiches you've been toting to work. 2 Oliver Street, Boston (617-482-9700).

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

Square Pegs... Liza's back in the headlines and suddenly cabaret is all the rage. Coincidence? We think not. Boston's seen a resurgence in variety shows in recent months, in large part because of Leah Callahan, the driving force behind Jacques' Raw Bar, Johnny D's Working Stiff Cabaret, and now Le Cabaret des Enfants Terribles, at PA's Lounge. Callahan's latest night, which takes its title from Jean Cocteau's 1929 novel, Les Enfants Terribles, premiered Feb. 28 and is scheduled to continue on the last Saturday of each month. The goal is to get a bunch of oddball acts under one roof. "I prefer not to have four white-guy rock bands because that's what you get everywhere else," says Callahan, who often books surrealist, "low-maintenance, high-mischief" performance acts sight-unseen. The next performance of Enfants Terribles is April 24. 345 Somerville Ave., Somerville (617-776-1557). 9 pm. $5.

No Storybook Ending... Like so many independent bookstores, the Avenue Victor Hugo Bookshop is closing its doors for good this May, after a 30-year run on Newbury Street. "People don't sit down and read the way they used to," says owner, Vincent McCaffrey. The bookshop will hold a half-off sale beginning April 1, with further price reductions to come. Blue Bart, the beloved store cat, will be retiring to the home of one of the store's employees. Our request for visitation rights was politely declined. 353 Newbury St., Boston (617-266-7746). www.avenuevictorhugobooks.com.

Speed Skills... If you've ever thought about attending a performance-driving school but were deterred by the expense, consider heading to the South Weymouth Naval Air Station May 22 and 23 for the Mazda Rev It Up driving school and autocross competition. For $40 you get some basic chalkboard instruction from race drivers, followed by three hands-on skills clinics. Participants try their new techniques on eight timed laps before heading to the competition course for two more laps. The driver with the best time gets to compete Mazda's national final at the Laguna Seca raceway near Monterey, Calif. The best part of the deal is that you perform your high-RPM heroics in a new Mazda3, thus sparing your own car from autocross abuse. Go to www.mazdarevitup.com to register.

Passions... Between the media frenzy sparked by Mel Gibson's The Passion of the Christ, and all of the Easter marketing schemes, dare we say JC is on the verge of being overexposed? We'll just have to wait and see how many people turn out for Indy Productions' debut show, a production of Jesus Christ Superstar. The start-up theater company, headed by Michael Peluso (who was one of the Improper's Boston's Best Bachelors in 2002), presents Andrew Lloyd Webber's classic musical at Babson College's Sorenson Center for the Arts April 8-10. Peluso takes the stage as Judas. $22. www.jcsuperstar.com.

Are You Being Served?... Boston barstool comedy reigns supreme in the new indie film Overserved. Director Joseph Gatto of Arlington's Liquid Lunch Productions bills his all-Boston flick (from the cast to the crew to the Sam Adams Brewery set) as a Cheers-meets-Clerks comedy in which a crew of no-nonsense bartenders engages in a battle of barroom wit and wisdom with customers. Indie film buffs can get a sneak preview of the movie before it goes Hollywood at the premieres, April 5 and 6 at the Arlington Regent Theatre. On the 5th, a post-party takes place at the Paradise Lounge with the cast and crew, the band Average White Boys and comedians Scott Carney and Lamont Price. www.overservedthemovie.com.

DRINK WET RESPONSIBLY

IT'S A PLEASURE

Tupperware can only dream of parties like this

If you're imagining this will be some type of lesbian sex fest, you're going to be disappointed," Elaine Lizotte, owner of KittyLixx, writes me in an e-mail. KittyLixx is, according to Lizotte's card, a purveyor of "adult novelties and purrfect pleasure toys." I have agreed to attend a KittyLixx party, wherein a group of women meet at someone's house and, fortified with a beverage or two, watch a presentation by Lizotte on the company's myriad wares. "Don't worry, I wasn't expecting it to be a lesbian sex fest," I write back to her, glad that e-mail makes it so easy to tell lies.

On the appointed night, I arrive at the home of Ann Marie, the evening's host. About 10 women are present, ranging in age from their 20s through their 40s, and some of them look like they're even more uncomfortable than I am. Lizotte helps leaven the atmosphere by passing out penis-shaped straws. She offers me one, but I decline. I'm a pretty open-minded guy, but as if I'm going to drink beer through a straw.

Lizotte goes on to give a little background on herself and KittyLixx. After getting laid off from an Internet company, she started her business to provide a means for women to purchase sex toys in a comfortable environment—"without the pervs watching you," as one woman comments, while I glance around and do my best to look nonpervish. Lizotte may claim that she's no longer working in the high-tech industry, but after seeing the Decadent Indulgence Techno Vibe, I'd beg to differ. The Techno Vibe features row of flashing lights along the base and looks like it could be used to direct 747s into their gates at Logan. But I'm getting ahead of myself.

After the introduction, Lizotte hands out door prizes. A woman named Melissa wins a waterproof vibrator, which prompts the woman next to me, Shelley, to say, "I keep mine in the shower. I have a little hook for it." The next prize is another vibrator, this one a "silver bullet" model. "Those are excellent," offers Shelley, who apparently is well acquainted with Mr. Steely Dan.

Soon the room is a veritable whirlwind of boudoir goodies. I guess my biggest surprise is that there's more to "pleasure toys" than just vibrators. We're talking creams, oils, sprays, candles, games, body glitter, pube stencils—it's enough to make your head spin like the tip of the Butterfly Pearl Vibe. Edibility is a theme with many of the products, such as a massage oil that Lizotte says "can be used anywhere and tastes delicious." Yeah, but how does it taste with the edible underwear? These are the kinds of tough questions that they train you to ask in journalism school.

Speaking of underwear, another item that's been going around the room is a remote-control vibrating thong. Eventually, someone other than the thong-wearer captures the remote and all hell breaks loose as the vibration is set to "hummingbird riding a jackhammer" speed. The presentation grinds to halt because everyone is laughing, as if there's anything funny about remote-control vibrating underpants.

Another surprise is the covert nature of some of the products. There's a vibrating pen that looks just like a regular pen—"great for conference calls," Lizotte says. And, in the "That's Just Wrong" category, we have I Rub My Duckie, which is a yellow rubber duckie that—you guessed it—vibrates. No one knows where the duckie's nose goes when the door's closed.

Next, a pair of fur-lined handcuffs comes out, prompting Ann Marie to say, "I already have those. I stole mine from my parents. The night of my confirmation I discovered that my parents were screwing like animals. My mom had all those hard vibrators." "Well, that's all they had back then, honey," replies Shelley sympathetically, as if Ann Marie had revealed that her mother used to churn her own butter or wash her clothes by pounding them on rocks in the river.

EVERYONE IS LAUGHING, AS IF THERE'S ANYTHING FUNNY ABOUT REMOTE-CONTROL VIBRATING UNDERPANTS

After the parade of products is over, the women head off with Lizotte one at a time to discuss their orders. A guy quietly sneaks into the kitchen and opens the fridge—the man of the house, who'd been making himself scarce the past couple hours. "Hey Brett, wanna see something?" calls one of the women, to which Brett quickly replies "Nope!" and disappears again. Well, Brett old buddy, you might've missed the presentation, but I have a feeling you'll be seeing some of this stuff real soon. iB

Soroff ON

TONY SHALHOUB

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Film and TV star Tony Shalhoub recently released his feature film directorial debut, Made Up, in which he co-stars alongside his wife, Brooke Adams, and Gary Sinise. Born and raised in Green Bay, Wisc., Shalhoub graduated from the University of Maine and earned a master's degree from the Yale Drama School before spending four seasons with the American Repertory Theatre in Cambridge. His distinguished New York stage career has included roles in Conversations with My Father (for which he earned a Tony nomination), Waiting for Godot, The Odd Couple and The Heidi Chronicles (in which he met his wife), as well as New York Shakespeare Festival productions of Henry IV Part 1 and Richard III. His feature film debut was as a doctor in the 1990 AIDS drama Longtime Companion, and his other film roles include Big Night, A Civil Action, Searching for Bobby Fischer, Men in Black, Barton Fink and Against the Ropes. Well-known to TV audiences for his role as an Italian cab driver on Nantucket in the long-running sitcom Wings, Shalhoub is currently starring as an obsessive-compulsive crime solver in the USA Network's critically acclaimed series Monk. He lives in Los Angeles.

Jonathan Soroff: Ever consider changing your name?

Tony Shalhoub: In a way, I did. When my Dad came over from Lebanon as a boy, there was a lot of pressure to assimilate. The original, Arabic pronunciation was "Shal-HOOB," and it kind of got bastardized as SHALL-ub. That's how I grew up, and how my siblings still refer to themselves. But when I was in grad school, people started to pronounce it the original way, just because they liked the sound of it, and around then, my father started regretting the change. When I met Brooke, she liked the original better, too, so it kind of evolved that way.

JS: Made Up is your directorial debut. What was the biggest surprise?

TS: Going into the editing room with something I'd lived with for a period of time, watching it over and over, deconstructing it, and having it evolve in its own way. At a certain point in the editing process, a film begins to lead the director and assert what it wants to be in spite of you. It turned out to be something very different than what I thought it would be.

JS: What would you do differently next time?

TS: Get a different director. [Laughs.] Seriously? I'd get a distribution deal going in, because that was the hardest part of all.

JS: You made a TV show set on Nantucket, but you have a house on Martha's Vineyard. Which island is better?

ALL ACTORS, WHETHER THEY LIKE TO ADMIT IT OR NOT, STEAL FROM OTHER ACTORS. IT'S A TRADITION, AND I DON'T THINK THERE'S ANYTHING WRONG WITH IT.

TS: That question answers itself.

JS: In Made Up, you had to purposely film your wife in an unflattering way. How'd that affect your marriage?

TS: Well, it's an enormous challenge to make my wife look anything other than gorgeous, but it didn't really affect our marriage. Brooke's very open and bold, and she wanted to do something that was risky. I sort of let her set the parameters

JS: How do you work with someone you're married to?

TS: We met doing a play together on Broadway, so the genesis of our relationship was in the workplace, and we've done a lot of jobs together since then. We played a brother and sister at the American Repertory Theatre a few years ago. I don't want to get into the Freudian implications of that. But Brooke did an episode of Wings. She's done an episode of Monk. We love to work together at every opportunity.

JS: Are you as much of a control freak as your character on Monk?

TS: I have to admit to being a huge control freak. There's just no denying it.

JS: How about things you're obsessive-compulsive about?

TS: I love to worry, especially about things I have no control over.

JS: You played a taxi driver on Wings and in several films. Ever get free cab rides because of that?

TS: No, but I do get a lot of free Italian meals in restaurants because of Big Night.

JS: Does being a good actor mean being a good liar?

TS: No. Being a good actor means being a good thief. All actors, whether they like to admit it or not, steal from other actors. It's a tradition, and I don't think there's anything wrong with it. It's just natural that we draw from each other, but in essence, it's thievery.

JS: What's one talent you wish you had?

TS: I wish I could sing and dance.

JS: Are you better at doing comedy or drama?

TS: I'd like to believe I do both equally well, but I don't know whether people see me as mostly a comic or serious actor. That's the great thing about Monk. I get to do both, which is a rarity in television.

JS: How about one piece of film you wish didn't exist of you?

TS: Oh, God, there are so many. I did a little part in Addams Family Values, where I was sort of a glorified extra, as a favor to Barry Sonnenfeld, the director, whom I adore. I played a sort of—I'm not even sure—Brazilian sailor in a bar, trying to pick up Joan Cusack, singing "Macho Man." It was a very misguided thing.

JS: Worst part of doing interviews?

TS: Well, it's bizarre, but a lot of times journalists misunderstand, or misinterpret, or write it down wrong, record it badly or whatever. I remember telling a reporter one time where I went to college. When the article came out, it said I went to the University of Maine in Portland, Oregon. I thought, "What's the point of doing an interview with someone who's not paying attention?"

JS: If your life was a song, what would it be and why?

TS: Oh, man. At my 50th birthday party this year, I had a bunch of people and a band. Tim Curry [star of the Rocky Horror Picture Show] is a good friend, and he sang a song called "Lucky to be Loving You." I think that would be it.

JS: Made Up has a lot to do with the pressure on women to maintain the appearance of youth and beauty. How important are looks in show business?

TS: I don't really think they're that important. I look around and see people who aren't necessarily good-looking, but they're talented and they're working all the time. They're well regarded and well respected. Look at Paul Giamatti or Philip Seymour Hoffman. They're not classic, matinee idol handsome, but they're excellent, versatile actors and they'll never stop working. Then there are people who are maligned unfairly because they're good-looking.

JS: Do you think you're good-looking?

TS: Well, I'm better-looking than you. [Laughs.]

JS: So what's your biggest personal vanity, or something you do solely to make yourself look good to others?

TS: I suppose some kind of self-deprecating, falsely humble look I give people, with the down-turned eyes. The false embarrassment—I can kinda pull that out at will.

JS: Plastic surgery. Had any?

TS: No, but I have been considering it.

JS: Really? What?

TS: I've been contemplating doing my lower eyes. I can't bear seeing them look old and saggy. Just something minor. Other than that, just pec implants. [Laughs.]

JS: Last question. Finish this sentence: Tony Shalhoub wants you to know that _____.

TS: Tony Shalhoub wants you to know that he's 50 years old and hasn't had a facelift. iB

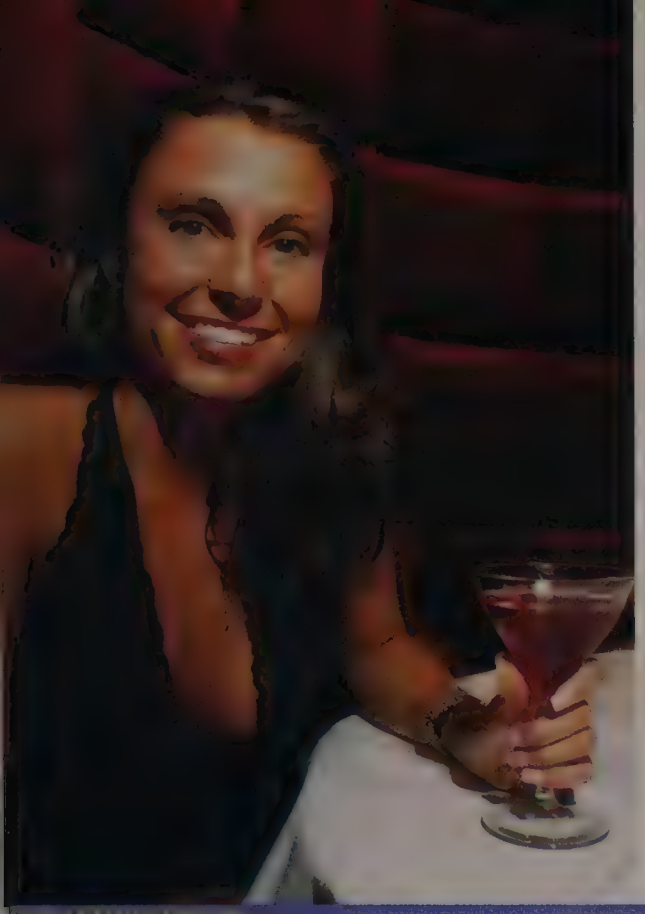
BY JONATHAN SOROFF

"This guy walks into a bar…"



There's a reason that line is the start of so many jokes. Bars are where the fun is. They're the communal campfires we gather round to relieve the stress of everyday life, and the launching pads for celebrating the good things. They offer comfort and camaraderie, and serve as happy hunting grounds for romance, not to mention supplying the socially acceptable chemical modification that some of us crave in the form of cocktails.

Yet there are the bars you go to simply because they're there, and then there are the bars that you're drawn to because of the people who work there. Our annual list of the city's most esteemed and adored bartenders is dedicated to those individuals who make us want to keep coming back to the places where they work.

Truly great bartenders are a breed apart. They have an endless supply of goodwill, humor, patience and skill, not to mention their finesse in dealing with the occasional drunk. Like rock stars, they exude an ineffable duende that makes their customers want to consider them friends. And like priests in the temple of good times, they traffic in witticisms and wisecracks, not to mention wisdom and a willingness to listen. Anyone can learn to mix a passable cocktail, and some of the world's most monumental bores spend their lifetime slinging drinks from behind a bar. But the great bartenders have the intelligence and personality traits to succeed in any profession—it's our good fortune that our beloved barkeeps truly enjoy what they do.

In the months leading up to this issue, we published a ballot with which readers could nominate their favorite cocktail jockey. Here we present the winners and tell you a bit about what makes them—and the places they work—such a hit with their regulars. (Eleven past favorites have been elevated to our Most Valuable Bartenders list. See sidebar at left.) As always, we've included a signature drink recipe from each of our winners in the hope that you'll keep this issue around long after you've finished reading it.

And so, THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN proudly presents Boston's Beloved Bartenders for 2004. Cheers!

FELT
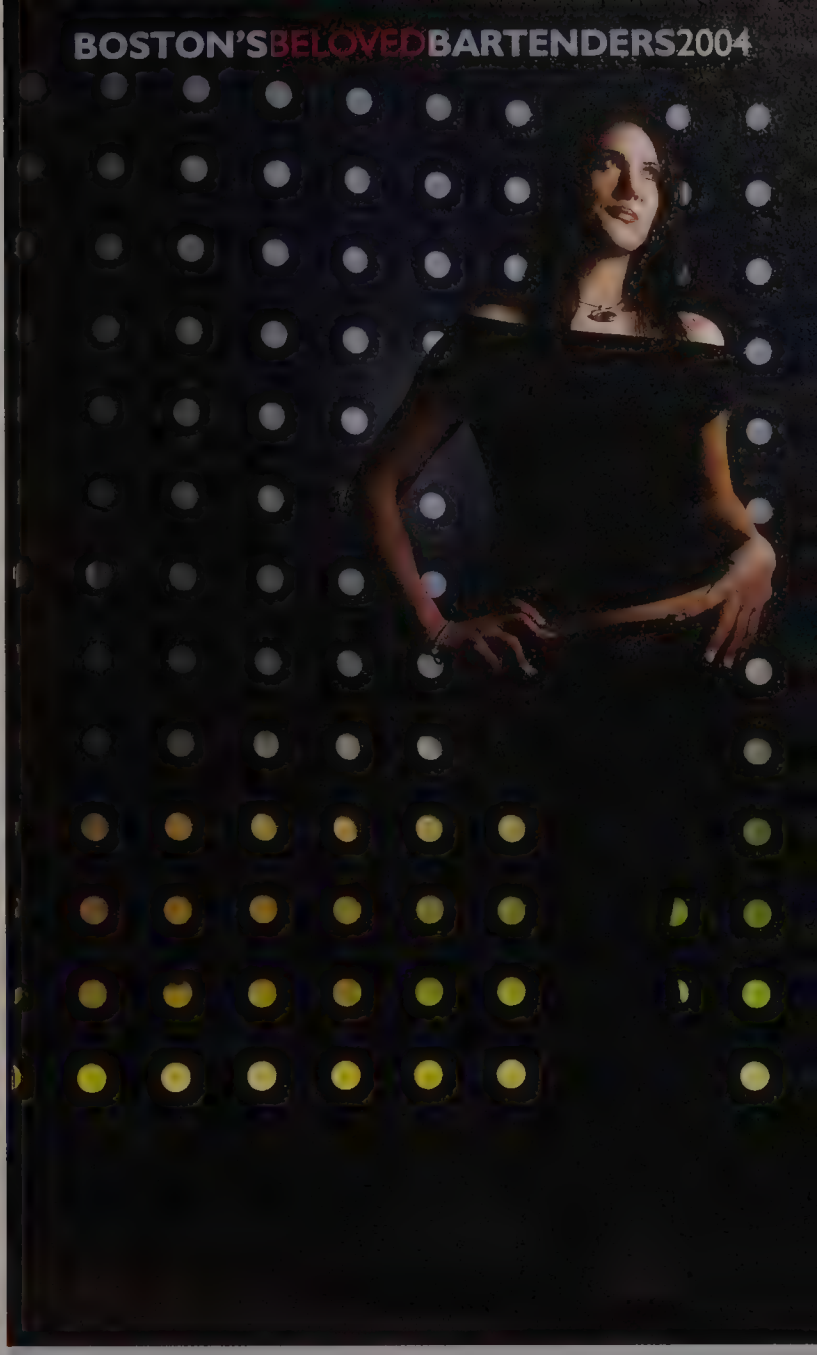
THU.–SAT. NIGHTS

A perpetual motion machine, Simon earned her stripes working in nightclubs, tending bar at Avalon for five years before taking up her current post at this Ladder District hot spot. In college, she studied sociology, and her work behind the bar allows her to practice as an amateur in the field, taking the time to talk to her customers even when the place gets insanely busy. Ironically, Simon is studying to become a drug and alcohol rehab counselor and hopes to work with the Department of Youth Services helping teens battle problems with substance abuse. In the meantime, her sparkling personality and dry sense of humor keep her regulars entertained, and her genuine, 100-watt smile keeps 'em coming back again and again. Explaining her amazingly upbeat disposition, she says, "If I'm not super happy, my customers know immediately, and they're not there to watch me have a bad night." We'll drink to that.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Sexy Bitch
2 parts each Stoli Razberi and Chambord, 1 part Triple Sec, and a splash each of ginger ale, sour mix and pineapple juice. Shake until it foams, and serve on the rocks, or straight up as a shot.



MICHAEL RAY
BLACKFIN CHOP HOUSE & RAW BAR
116 HUNTINGTON AVE., BOSTON, 617-247-2400
MON.–FRI. DAYS AND NIGHTS

As affable a chap as jolly old England ever produced, Ray still retains a touch of a British accent that makes everything from "Bordeaux" to "Budweiser" sound posh when he says it. His style combines refined, polite, old-world service with a playful edge that prevents things from becoming stuffy. "You can go anywhere for a drink," he says, "but you'll go out of your way for a bartender who makes you feel like you're at Raffles or in a James Bond movie." The atmosphere Ray brings makes eating at the bar in Tony Ambrose's upscale yet casual steakhouse as popular as sitting in the dining room. His infectiously upbeat personality allows him to relate to anyone: To the guys he's a man's man, and he's equally adept at dishing with the ladies, who consequently adore him.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Raspberry Lemondrop Martini
1½ oz. Vox Raspberry, ½ oz. Cointreau, a squeeze of fresh lemon juice and a splash of simple syrup. Shake and serve straight up in a martini glass with a sugared rim. Garnish with a lemon twist and a raspberry.

DINA MEUSE
AQUA
120 WATER ST. BOSTON, 617-720-4900
TUE., THU. AND FRI. NIGHTS

CLARKE'S
QUINCY MARKET, 21 MERCHANTS ROW. BOSTON, 617-227-7800
SUN. NIGHTS

Meuse is known among her regulars simply by her first name, and like Cher or Madonna, she has become something of an icon, at least among the patrons of the bars where she works. Some of them have been loyal customers since she put herself through college tending bar. She majored in sociology, and after leaving her job as a social worker with the state's Department of Social Services, she decided to apply her highly developed interpersonal skills in another setting where they'd be appreciated. The quintessential "people person," Meuse is laid-back and easy-going, quick to point out that "if I'm having a good time, my customers are too." A queen of the one-liner, she's liable to respond to a question like, "What do you have that's strong but sweet?" with a comment like, "Sorry, but I won't fit in a glass." Like a seasoned politician, she remembers not just the names and drinks of her regulars, but their spouses' and kids' names, as well. In short, she makes everyone who steps up to her bar feel like a big shot, which makes us want to drink a big shot in her honor.

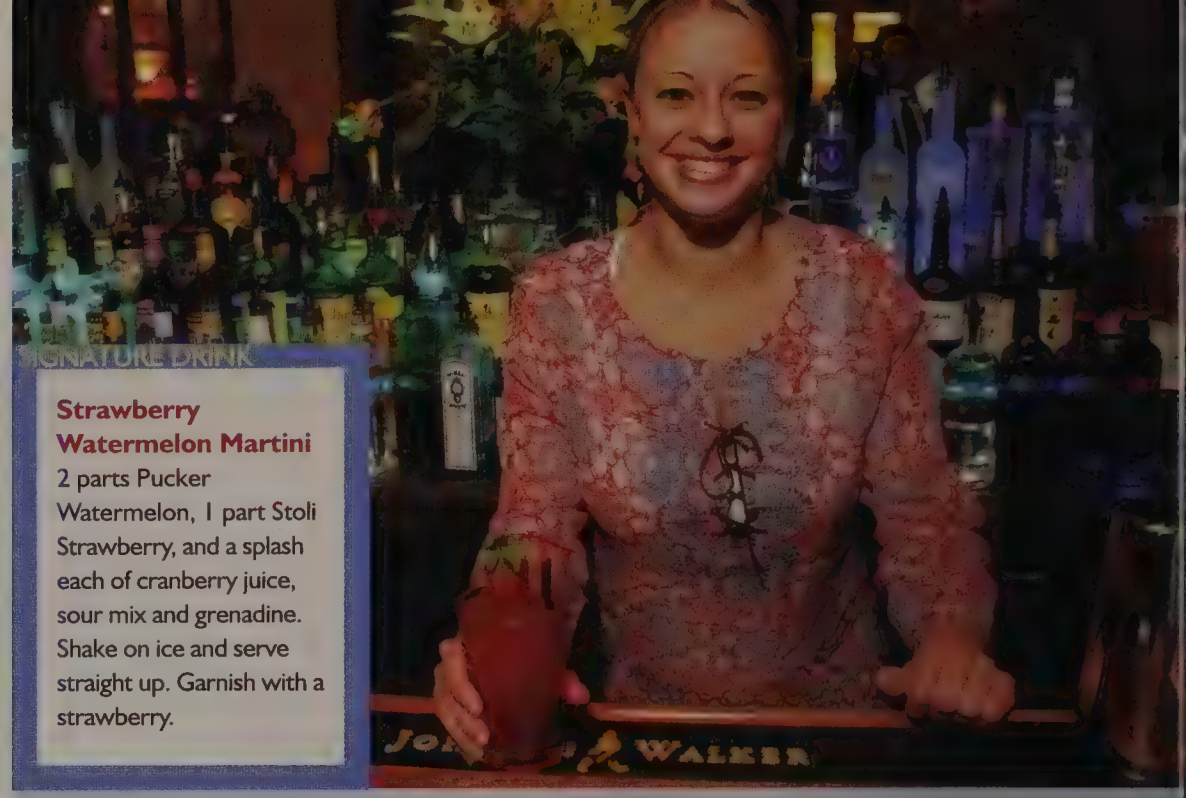
SIGNATURE DRINK

Ankles in the Sky
Equal parts UV Cherry Vodka, UV Raspberry Vodka, blue curacao and Absolut Citron, with a splash each of cranberry juice and sour mix. Shake on ice and serve straight up as a shot.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Bloody Dubliner

2 oz. Stoli Citros, ½ oz. lemon juice, ¼ oz. pomegranate juice, 1 oz. simple syrup. Shake on ice and serve straight up in a martini glass. Garnish with a lemon slice.



JOANIE LEONARD

THE RACK

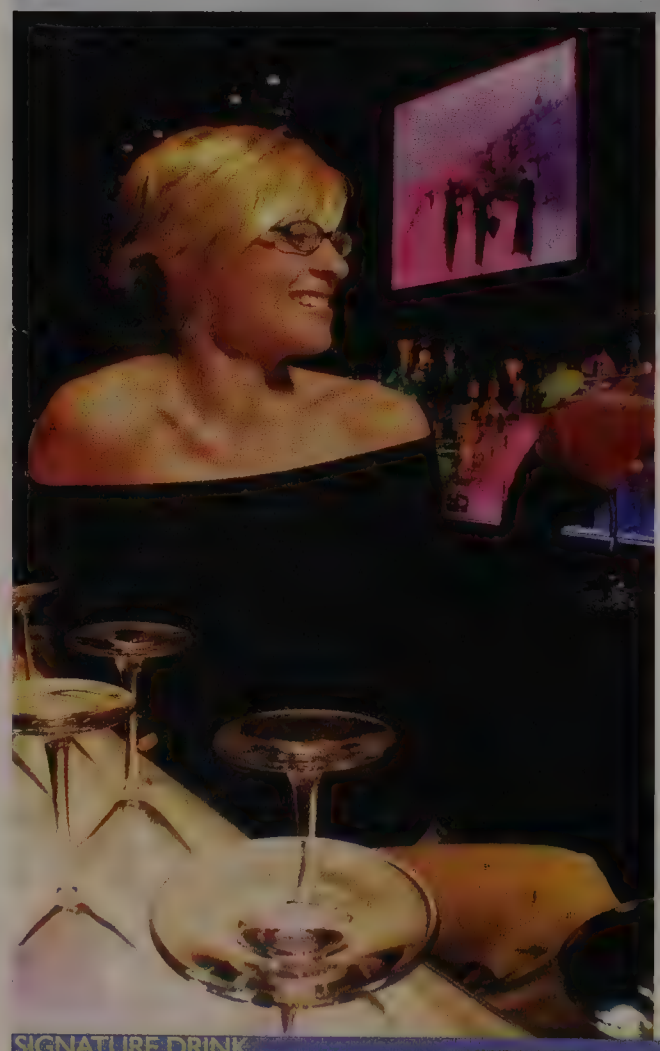
MON.–FRI. DAYS

This native of Dublin loves to entertain her regulars with stories about colorful characters back home, and judging by her customers' loyalty, she has her countrymen's natural gift of gab. Many of Leonard's regulars—suits from the Financial District and civil servants from City Hall—come in as often as three times a week, while some—like the policemen and construction workers from the Big Dig—visit her daily. That's pretty impressive for a bartender who pours mostly soft drinks (since she works days), although she starts to get the after-work-martini crowd once the stock market closes. A blonde bundle of energy with a 100-proof personality, she's also a favorite among the tourists and vacationers who visit Faneuil Hall and return repeatedly to her bar for a bit of her blarney, a bite to eat and a libation (or two) garnished with the bar's trademark plastic animals. The perfect combination of sweetheart and smartass, she's as charming as the day is long, and an hour spent at her bar is like a well-drawn pint of Guinness.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Strawberry Watermelon Martini

2 parts Pucker Watermelon, 1 part Stoli Strawberry, and a splash each of cranberry juice, sour mix and grenadine. Shake on ice and serve straight up. Garnish with a strawberry.



MIA SCALISI

THE PLACE

WED.–FRI. NIGHTS

A chameleon who can change her style to suit her customers' moods, Scalisi can be formal and businesslike or flirty and fun, although the end of the evening usually finds her dancing behind her bar, a drink-making whirling dervish. Her energy level would make a Geiger counter go haywire, and her habit of egging her regulars on with inducements like a shot of tequila and lime juice makes her bar a nonstop party. In her trademark knee-high boots with six-inch heels, she looks a good foot taller than her petite 5'2" frame, and her heartbreaking good looks make her a particular favorite among the men, who have tried every trick in the book to get her phone number. Like the girl you drooled over in high school, she's the head cheerleader and pep squad captain at this rowdy downtown watering hole, and one trip to her bar is all it takes to see why they're usually three-deep, clamoring for her attention.

TRINA STURM

CITY BAR

LENOX HOTEL, 61 EXETER ST., BOSTON, 617-536-5300

TUE., THU., FRI. NIGHTS

As gifted as she is gorgeous, this veteran of Lansdowne Street (she worked at Axis for four years) is the bar manager of this swanky but relaxed hipster hangout in the lobby of the Lenox Hotel. What draws her to the job is the creativity: "All those bottles we get to play with—it's the best-stocked bar I've ever seen." The unique infusions—bourbon flavored with Chinese cinnamon, vanilla and caramelized figs, or rum spiced with ginger, lemon peel and cardamom—are well worth the trip. In addition to being able to make all the standard cocktails quickly and consistently, Sturm is a virtual encyclopedia when it comes to liquors, Cognacs and Armagnacs. Able to converse intelligently and engagingly on any topic (although she wisely avoids religion and politics), she's as warm as a slug of whiskey, as bracing as a gin martini and as intoxicating as a shot of tequila. Someday, she and her husband (also a bartender) hope to open their own place, but for now, we're lucky we can find her here.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Bramble

3 parts Hendrick's Gin, 1 part Crème de Cassis. Top with fresh lime juice and a splash of simple syrup. Shake on ice and serve straight up in a martini glass. Garnish with a wedge of lime.

BARRY KIERANS
TONIC
1316 COMMONWEALTH AVE., BRIGHTON, 617-566-6699
THU.–SAT. NIGHTS AND SUNDAY BRUNCH

A native of Drogheda, Ireland (a small town north of Dublin), Kierans has the charming brogue and the twinkle in his eye to prove it. Too handsome by half, with dark hair and green eyes, he's the resident heartthrob at this Allston hangout for the sophisticated postcollege crowd. His strengths include faster-than-a-speeding-bullet mixing skills—he can make seven or eight martinis a minute. "I could do any number of things," he says matter-of-factly. "I do what I do because I enjoy it. It's like getting paid to hang out with my friends." His slightly cocky style behind the bar belies a patient manner—he'll lend an ear to a customer's woes, although he's also a bit of a joker and as quick with a one-liner as he is with a cocktail shaker. It's not often that such competence comes in such a hunk-a-licious package.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Love Martini
Equal parts Stoli Razberi, crème de cocoa and Cointreau. Shake and serve straight up in a martini glass. Garnish with a maraschino cherry.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Pomegranate Martini
To 3 parts Grey Goose Vanilla Vodka add ¼ oz. Mathilde Pêches liqueur, 3 tablespoons pomegranate puree and a splash each of fresh-squeezed lemon juice, sour mix and Sprite. Shake on ice and serve straight up in a martini glass. Garnish with a lime wheel.

MICHELLE CONTE
UNION BAR AND GRILLE
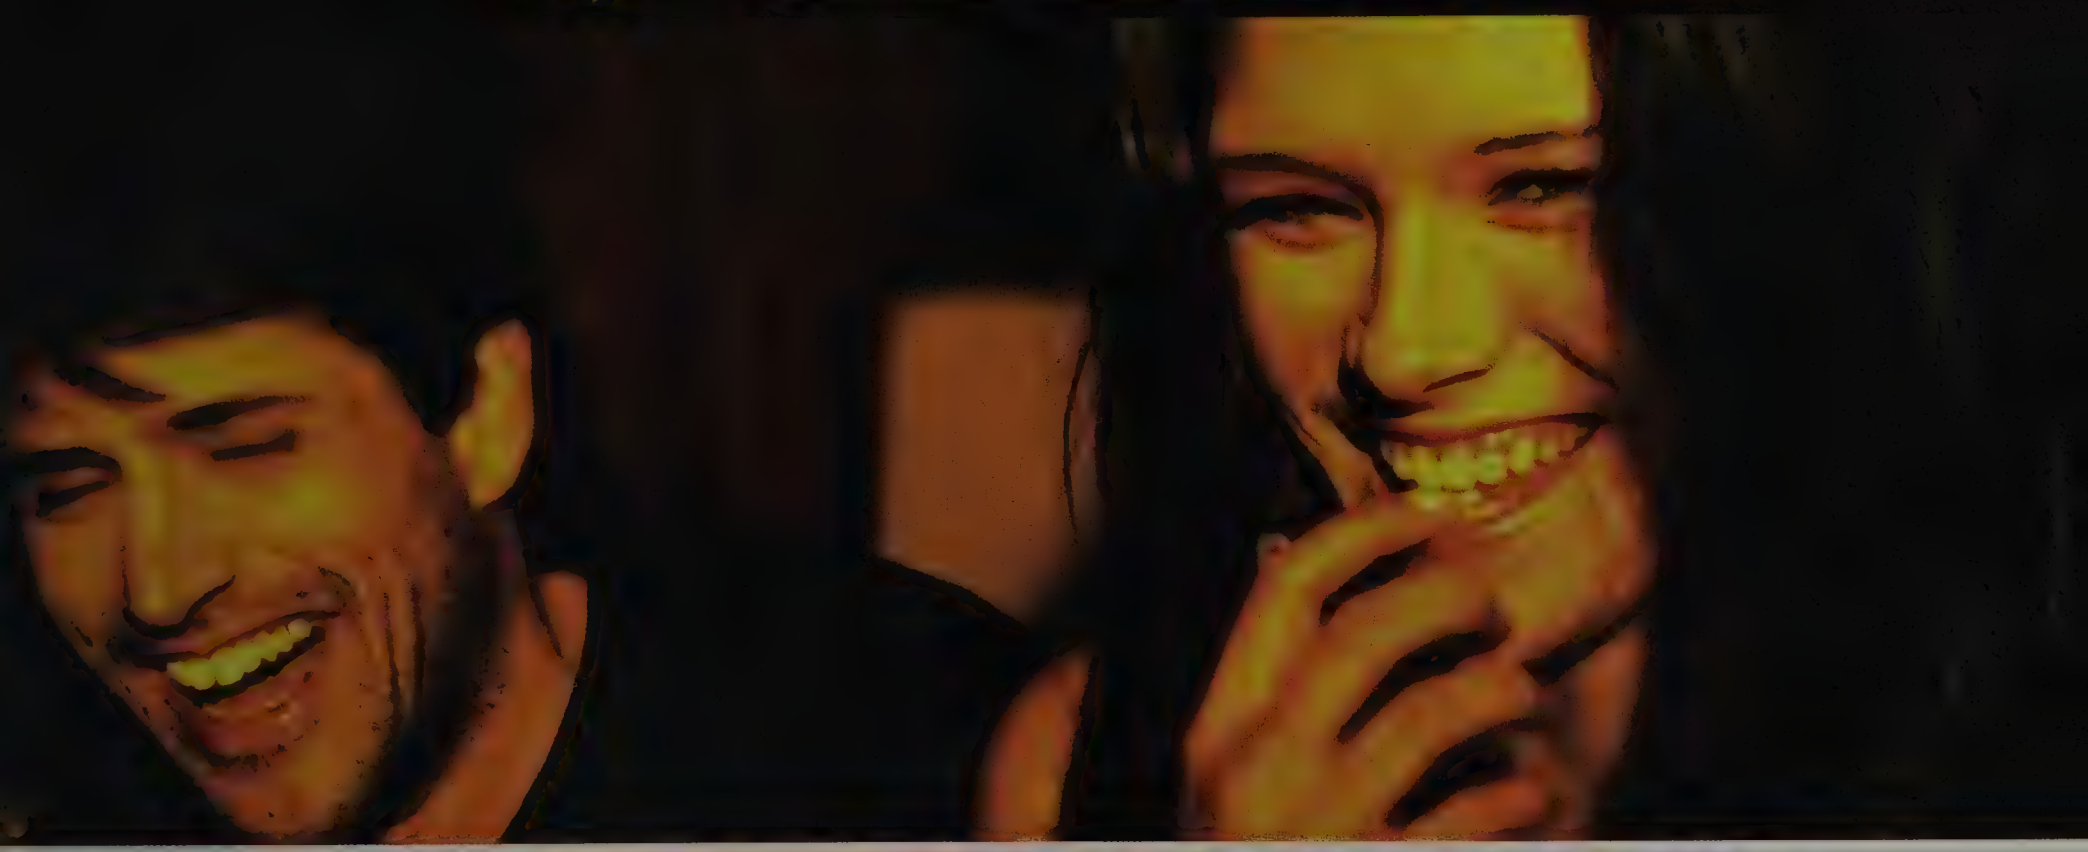
MON., THU.–SAT. NIGHTS

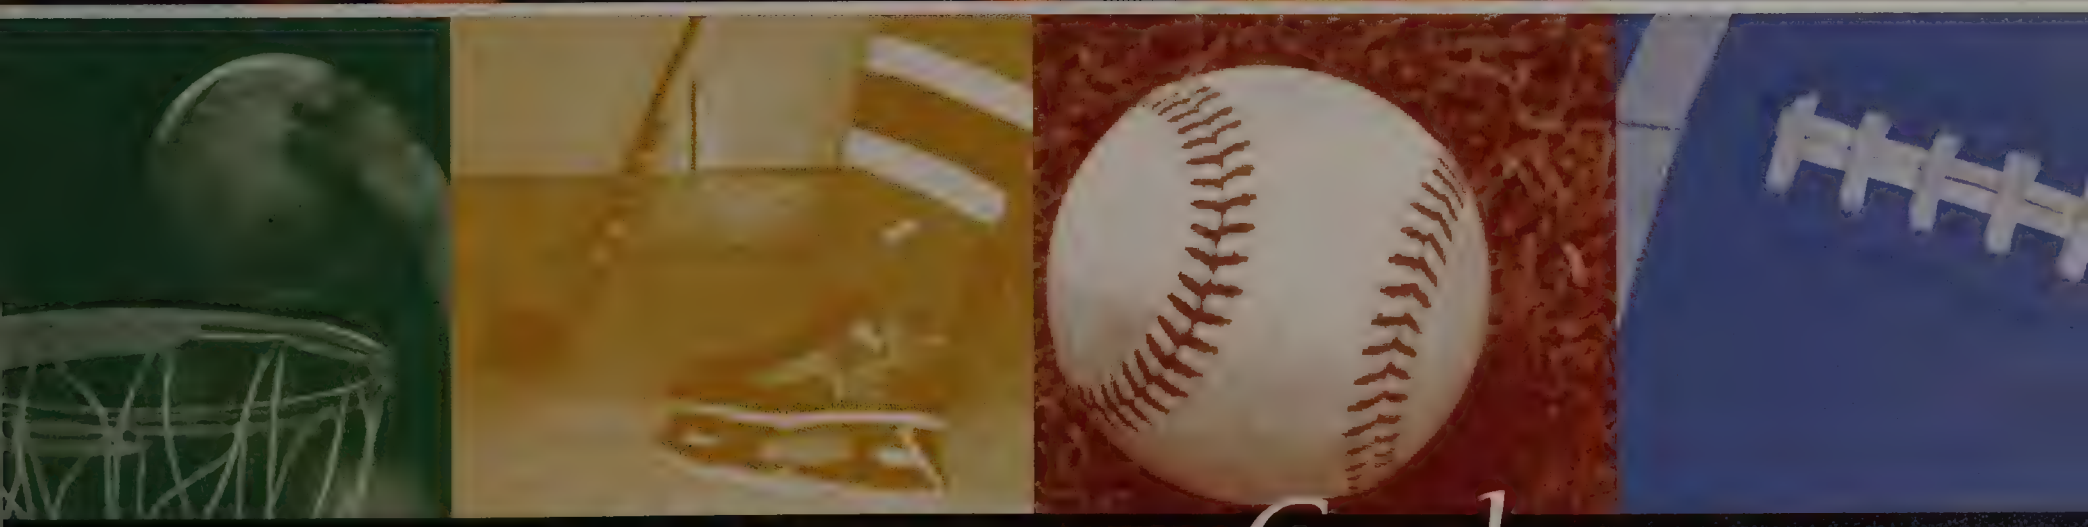
If fabulousness came in a bottle, Conte's face would be on the label. A naturally carbonated, intoxicating redhead originally from Denver, she studied musical theater in college and voice at the New England Conservatory, which may partially account for her poise, grace and ability to improvise. "If you're paying 10 bucks for a drink, it better be good," she says. Regardless of their mood when they walk in the door, her regulars are always laughing and smiling by the time they leave. As one of the South End's choicest new destinations, Union attracts a worldly, urbane bar clientele, and Conte provides the kind of sophisticated, discerning service her customers expect. She's also a genius at developing a genuine rapport instantly—after one drink, everyone feels like a friend. Worth her weight in Goldschlager, she's as pleasant to talk to as she is to look at.

ALLY MORRILL
THE CACTUS CLUB
939 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON, 617-236-0200
FIVE NIGHTS A WEEK (VARIES)

Morrill is the kind of bartender who makes a cold, impersonal city feel like a snug, comfortable small town. Chatty and talkative, she has a memory like a steel trap, and her ability to recall not just faces and names but drinks and details about her customers ("How was vacation?" "How's your daughter?") has earned her a loyal following. A Northeastern student who's taking some time off, she's a native of Albany, N.Y.—"So I don't really get it when people here complain about the cold," she says. It also means that she grew up a Yankees fan, although she does everything she can to hide that fact. Her first bartending gig was at a hole-in-the-wall in upstate New York, and her favorite thing about working at this Tex-Mex hot spot in the Back Bay is the wide spectrum of customers—regulars from the Back Bay and Fenway as well as tourists and shoppers from the Pru. Comfortable talking to anyone, she can be opinionated and sarcastic. For instance, a big brawny guy who orders a strawberry daiquiri is guaranteed to get a comment along with his drink. Imagine your super-cool, smart-as-a-whip kid sister behind a bar and you get the picture.



SIGNATURE DRINK



The Platinum Margarita
3 parts Hornitos Tequila to 1 part Cointreau and a splash of fresh lime juice. Fill with lemonade. Shake on ice or mix in a blender and serve straight up, on the rocks, or frozen, in a margarita glass with or without a salted rim. Garnish with lime.

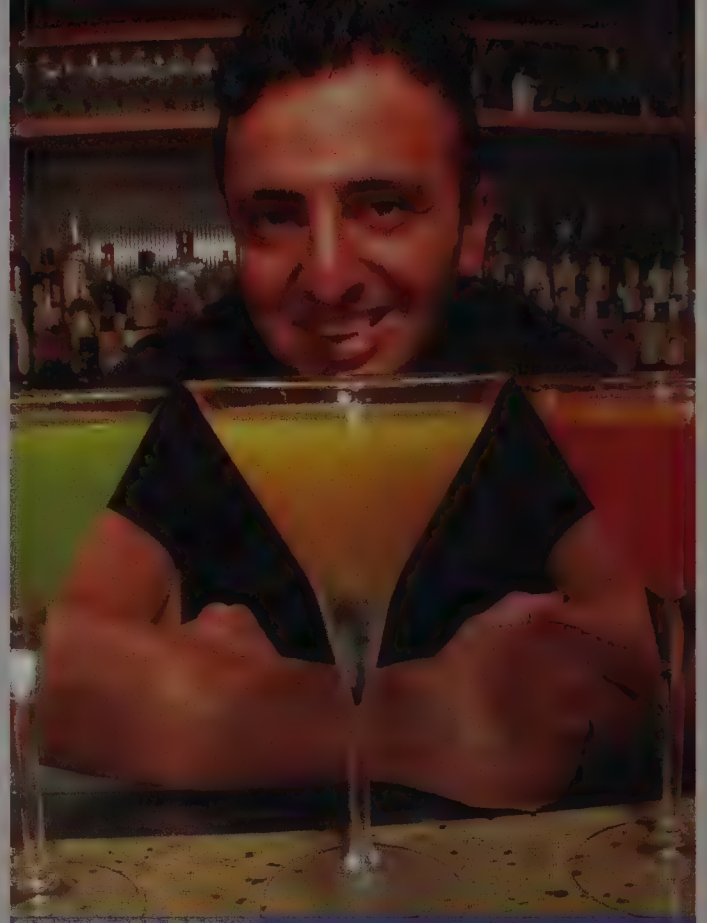
JILL SMAGULA
NOIR
1 BENNETT ST., CAMBRIDGE, 617-661-8010
TUE., WED., FRI., SAT. NIGHTS



Tucked into a corner of the lobby in Harvard Square's ritziest hotel—and the holder of Cambridge's only 2 am liquor license—the upscale Noir attracts an intriguing mix of visiting dignitaries, Harvard professors and colorful Cambridge characters. Ministering to this motley crew, New Hampshire native Smagula uses her abundant charm to keep everyone happy. "Basically, I get paid to hang out with friends," she says. A big one for mixing a round of shots and making everyone at the bar toast, she's more fun than the proverbial barrel of monkeys and mixes a flawless cocktail, to boot. In fact, she invented many of the drinks on the bar's extensive menu, and she devotes her slow times to the eternal search for new yummy concoctions. She also possesses one of the cardinal virtues for any bartender in Beantown: an obsession with the Red Sox.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Naughty Au Pear
1½ oz. Belle de Brillet, ¾ oz. Stoli Vanil, 1 oz. pear nectar. Shake on ice and serve straight up in a cocktail glass. Top off with a splash of Champagne Veuve Clicquot.

CENGIZ YILDIRIM
BLU
4 AVERY ST., BOSTON,
617-375-8550
MON.–FRI. DAYS; SAT. NIGHTS

A one-man three-ring circus, Yildirim was born in Turkey, raised in Switzerland and Germany, and has visited 72 countries, many as a bartender on luxury cruise ships like the Queen Elizabeth II. With 20 years of bartending experience and a nuclear reactor's worth of energy, he's created the exhaustive drink menus for most of the bars he's worked at. Like a mad scientist, he can mix anything together and make it taste good. "If someone says they don't know what they want to drink, I'll say, 'Name a color,' and I'll make up something they love," he says. Not surprisingly, those who come to his bar once invariably become repeat customers. In addition to knowing seemingly everyone in town, Yildirim knows exactly how to handle people—as one regular puts it, "He could sell martinis to a Mormon." Add to that the fact that we've never seen him in a mood that was less than ecstatic, and it's easy to understand why a stool at his bar is one of the most sought-after seats in town.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Vitamin C Martini
2 oz. Belvedere Orange Vodka, a splash each of Grand Marnier Centenaire, fresh-squeezed orange juice, grenadine and Southern Comfort, and a squeeze of fresh lime. Shake on ice and serve straight up. Garnish with a slice of blood orange.

SRDJAN BAJAS
THE FEDERALIST
15 BEACON ST., BOSTON,
617-670-2515
WED.–SAT. NIGHTS

This veteran mixologist—a native of Croatia, raised in Germany—has worked in Stuttgart and Munich and tended bar at some of the finest hotels in the world, including the five-star, five-diamond Broadmoor in Colorado Springs. As bar manager at Boston's most quietly elegant boutique hotel, Bajas is a fountain of knowledge about Cognacs, Armagnacs and single-malt scotches, and he oversees one of the city's best selections. In keeping with the hotel's emphasis on quality, he has developed a drink list (which he is constantly adding to) that relies on the finest and freshest ingredients. And his skill in making the classics is equaled by his creativity in coming up with new concoctions. With his European charm, attention to detail and warm, easygoing manner, he's like the bartender in Casablanca.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Due Campari
½ oz. each Rain Vodka and White Campari, 1 oz. Red Campari and a dash of freshly squeezed lemon juice. Shake on ice and strain into a champagne flute until one-third full. Top with Champagne Veuve Clicquot.

SAINT
90 EXETER ST., BOSTON, 617-236-1134
SAT., SUN. NIGHTS

As easygoing as she is easy on the eyes, this veteran of the Lansdowne Street club scene has been tending bar for years and clearly delights in interacting with her regulars. Presiding over the sleek, minimalist bar at L, the chic new restaurant on the first floor of Louis Boston, Jordan's approach to her job is to make sure every patron receives the very highest level of service. No private eye pays closer attention to details, and her ability to anticipate customers' needs is nothing short of clairvoyant. Whether there are two people at her bar or they're lined up three deep, the only difference in her unfailingly friendly service is how much time she has for conversation. Her experience with both high-volume drink slinging and slower-paced fine dining means she can keep the throngs happy and knows a tremendous amount about food and wine. But most importantly, her genuine love for the job is evident in every drink she makes.

SIGNATURE DRINK

SAT. NIGHTS

Looking like he fell out of an Abercrombie & Fitch catalog, Henry is what central casting would send over if you asked them for a hottie with a head on his shoulders. During the week, he works in advertising, but on Saturday nights, you can find him slinging drinks and dancing shirtless behind the bar at Buzz, one of Boston's hottest gay discos. On Sundays, he oversees the more subdued scene at Dedo, Bay Village's ambient little lounge. Happy-go-lucky and perpetually smiling, he was probably the kid in third grade whose report card said, "Plays well with others." If you're one of the lucky guys he plucks off the dance floor to dance with him on the bar, chances are you'll leave with a dopey grin. A heartthrob who knows how to handle a martini shaker while shaking his money maker, he's the epitome of service with sizzle.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Surfer on Acid
1½ oz. each of Malibu Rum and Jägermeister, and a splash of pineapple juice. Shake on ice and serve straight up as a shot.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Hammer's Punch
In a pint glass with ice, pour 1 oz. Captain Morgan Original Spiced Rum, 1 oz. Captain Morgan Parrot Bay Rum, ½ oz. each fresh-squeezed orange juice and lime juice. Fill with pineapple juice and add a splash of cranberry. Shake and serve on the rocks. Garnish with a cherry.

GREG HAMM

SWEETWATER CAFÉ
5 BOYLSTON PLACE, BOSTON, 617-351-2515
FRI. NIGHTS AND RANDOM SHIFTS

An avuncular guy with a smile the size of the Big Dig, Hamm presides over the bar at this American tavern with live acoustic music (Thursdays through Saturdays), trivia contests, superior pub grub, cheap beer and strong drinks. The clientele runs the gamut, from construction workers to executives, and he treats them all with the punctilious service his perfectionism demands. Having worked in two of the region's premier resort areas—Ludlow, Vt. (home of the Okemo ski area) and Nantucket—he's experienced at helping people chill out. He also knows how to tailor his attentions to suit a customer's mood. "I'm good at conversation," he says, "and I'm good at leaving people alone." Laid-back and attitude free, he's as easygoing as a Sunday afternoon on the Esplanade.

WED.–SAT. NIGHTS

10 AVERY ST., BOSTON,
617-574-7100
MON., TUE. NIGHTS

Like the Dorian Gray of Boston bartenders, Arredondo has been at it forever but still looks studly after 21 years. Perhaps it's the fact that he hails from the Colombian city of Medellin, known as the city of eternal spring. Whatever his secret, you can't argue with his success. "I'm the ice-breaker," he says, "The only ice at my bar is in the drinks." Having overseen the legendary bar scene at Biba for 13 years, he's now catering to a new generation of discerning drinkers, and some of his regulars are the children of original customers. He's become so much a part of the city's social fabric that he's known not only as a distinguished mixologist but as a lousy golfer and a frequent guest at his regulars' country clubs. Arredondo likes to say that anyone can work a busy bar, but to make an empty bar feel lively takes real skill. And his bar is always happening, whether it's jam-packed or just you and him.

SIGNATURE DRINK

California Hot Tub
4 oz. Stoli Doli (pineapple-infused vodka) and a splash each of Chambord and sour mix. Shake on ice, strain into a martini glass, and top with prosecco (Italian sparkling white wine).

FIVE NIGHTS A WEEK

75 CHESTNUT
75 CHESTNUT ST., BOSTON, 617-227-2175
THU. NIGHTS

It takes a bartender of unusual talent to live up to the mythic expectations put upon Cheers by the enduring popularity of the eponymous TV show, and this Roslindale native fits the bill. Along with the Boston accent that tourists expect, Roberts has an acerbic, self-deprecating wit that outstrips sitcom dialogue. Not surprisingly, the occasional patron calls her Carla, to which she's apt to snap, "I'm not her, but why don't you shut up and have a beer?" Known as "Robo" to her colleagues because of her cyborg-like ability to handle a busy bar, she's a rabid Boston sports fan and has fun with out-of-town patrons (especially New Yorkers) when there's a Red Sox, Bruins, Celtics or Patriots game on. Like her TV counterpart, her tough exterior hides an inner softie—co-worker Eddie Doyle (see Most Valuable Bartenders) says she's one of the most active employees on behalf of the numerous charities the bar supports.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Roborita
2 parts Absolut Mandarin to 1 part blue curacao, a splash of orange juice and pineapple juice. Shake on ice and serve on the rocks in a glass with a sugared rim. Garnish with an orange slice and a cherry.

MIKE SHERIDAN

IRONSIDE GRILL
25 PARK ST., CHARLESTOWN,
TUE.–SAT. NIGHTS

Part political satirist, part sports nut, part shoulder to cry on and all-around general smartass, Sheridan has been a bartender for over 10 years, and with the myriad of amazing characters he meets, he sees every night as another chapter in a riveting book. A Southie/Dorchester native, he's known for his iconoclastic music taste—'80s hair bands like Def Leppard, Bon Jovi and Van Halen—and many of his regulars at this Charlestown neighborhood bar have become friends whom he socializes with outside of work. Although he's worked in management at several restaurants and received credit for improving the bottom line in at least two, he always finds a way to get back behind the bar. The ideal employee and the ultimate schmoozer, he guarantees at least three things when you sit down at his bar: attentiveness, entertainment and your favorite libation, exactly the way you like it.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Chocolate Chip Cookie Dough Martini
1 part Godiva Dark Chocolate Liqueur, 3 parts Van Gogh Dutch Chocolate Vodka, 1 part Just Desserts Chocolate Chip Cookie Liqueur. Shake on ice, and pour into a chocolate-drizzled martini glass. Garnish with chocolate shavings.

MOJITO, WHO ARE YOU?

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

You are what you drink.

Or are you?

To find out, we conducted a brunch-time poll to determine what the cocktail you order says about you. Our (admittedly unscientific) study employed Rorschach inkblot methodology: The name of a drink was called out, and our subjects were asked to say the first thing that came to mind when they pictured the man or woman who would order it.

Our focus group included three men and three women—a bartender, a bar owner and four highly accomplished barflies in good standing.

Some of their comments may seem harsh, judgmental and less than kind, and we certainly don't mean to offend anyone, but wouldn't you rather know what subliminal message you may be sending?

Here's what the experts had to say:

If you order a _____, you're probably _____.

GIN MARTINI
For a man: Republican.
For a woman: Crazy.

A SPECIFIC RED WINE VARIETAL
For a man: A connoisseur; sophisticated.
For a woman: Gonna have at least four.

CHARDONNAY
For a man: An out-of-town gay guy over 50.
For a woman: In from the suburbs, and going to have at least 10.

PABST BLUE RIBBON
For a man: A hipster poseur who thinks he's in Williamsburg.
For a woman: A rock chick with a lotta tattoos.

BOURBON ON THE ROCKS
For a man: Knows what he wants; either a man's man or wants to look like one.
For a woman: Heavy smoker; probably good in bed.

COSMOPOLITAN
For a man: Someone who doesn't like alcohol and shouldn't be drinking it; a neuter.
For a woman: Single and horny.

MOJITO
For a man: A loathsome, vile creature who has mistaken himself for Papa Hemingway.
For a woman: More trouble than she's worth.

B-52 SHOT
For a man: An inconsiderate pain in the ass who wants to make the bartender work hard for his tip.
For a woman: Lost her way in Faneuil Hall.

SHOT OF TEQUILA
For a man: Wishes Jimmy Buffet was playing right now.
For a woman: Wishes she was in Mexico right now.

DIET COKE
For a man: An alcoholic straight from his AA meeting; probably a narcissist.
For a woman: Has an eating disorder and is looking to score some hielo.

SEX ON THE BEACH
For a man: A cheesy 18-year-old; a bridge-and-tunnel, MTV Beach Party meathead whose car has a bumper sticker that reads, "Honk if you're horny."
For a woman: Area code 508, 781, 413, 978...

CRISTAL OR DOM PERIGNON
For a man: A freshman at BU; a gangsta wannabe; a guy who wants to impress his date and probably can't afford it.
For a woman: The divorce just went through—her boyfriend's paying.

SINGLE-MALT SCOTCH
For a man: Probably smokes cigars; paid for his date; has a small penis.
For a woman: Is the paid date—either that, or a divorcée who got all the money and is on her second round of plastic surgery.

LONG ISLAND ICED TEA
For a man: Looking to get f'ed up!
For a woman: Has been in a correctional facility since 1983.

JILL LEGRAND
LUCKY'S
355 CONGRESS ST., BOSTON, 617-357-5825
THU.–SUN. NIGHTS

LeGrand will chill with you while she's chilling your martini and can keep up the banter even when the bar is hopping. An Emerson grad who eventually wants to work in public relations and event planning for a nonprofit, she helps keep the vibe upbeat at this Rat Pack–inspired clubhouse for the unpretentiously hip, located in South Boston's Seaport District. Known for making a mean Manhattan, she's the girl with the nose ring and a million little hair extensions, whose hairstyle changes—from long to short and curly to straight—almost every night. Her approach to mixing drinks is equally improvisational. She can make a perfect classic cocktail, create something new on the spot, or, on nights when customers are three deep at the bar, keep churning out the drinks. She's like that cool chick from high school who straddled all the cliques and hung out with everyone, except that the drinks are legal.

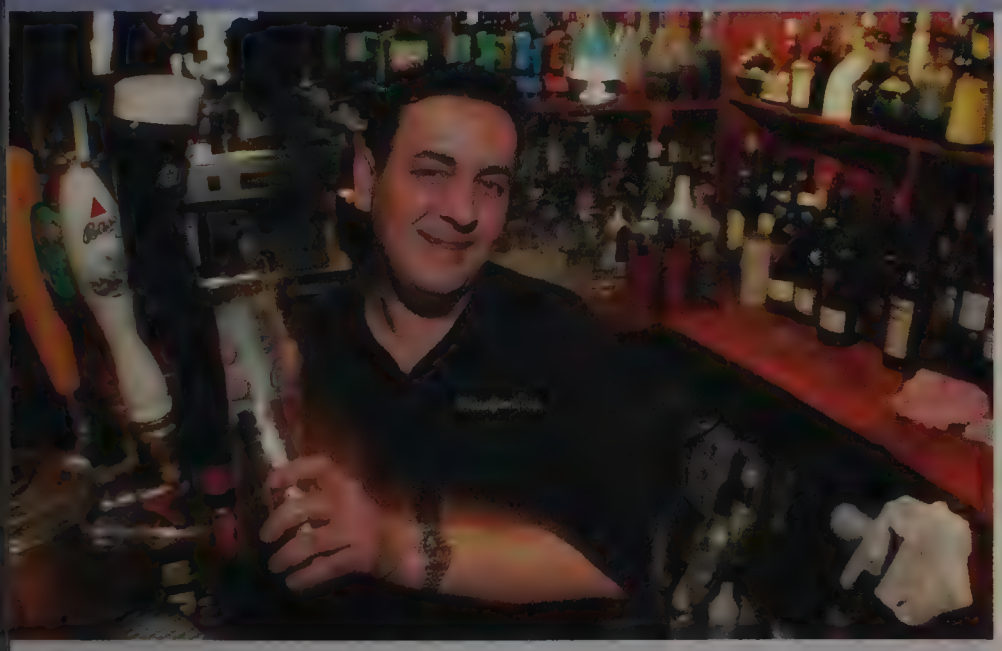
SO YOU WANT TO BUY A BAR?

Becoming your own Sam Malone isn't as easy as you might think

BY EZRA DYER

At some time or another, most everyone who goes to bars has probably glanced around a crowd of patrons jostling one another for the opportunity to buy expensive drinks and wondered, "Why don't I own a bar?"

As you might have guessed, buying a pub isn't as simple as signing your name on the dotted line and watching the money roll in. Assuming you've already lined up financing, you'll probably want to buy a place that already has a liquor license—which means taking over an existing bar. "In Boston, it's difficult to buy a place and then put in a liquor license," says Patrick Lee, owner of the Irish Village, Grafton Street, Temple Bar and Redline. "There's a cap on liquor licenses, and they're at that cap right now. It's easier to just buy an existing place." Of the money you'll spend to purchase your new digs, Lee estimates that $100,000 to $150,000 of the price is for the liquor license alone.



Once you've found the spot for your new watering hole, you'll need to take care of a few other details. Actually, make that a slew of other details. "You need a good attorney," says Paul Barclay, owner of the Rack. "Then, you go to the neighborhood and build up some goodwill in advance. Participate in some charities and get your name out there, because given the option, neighbors always come out of the woodwork—'I saw a coaster on the street, I'm pretty sure litter is coming from that bar!' Then, you go before the city liquor board and the entertainment board, and you get investigated by the Alcoholic Beverages Control Commission to see where your money came from." Assuming all of that works out, you then need to secure liability insurance, which, in the wake of last year's Station nightclub fire in Rhode Island, is both expensive and difficult to obtain. "A lot of companies have stopped writing policies for nightclubs," Barclay says. "I used to have several companies competing for my policy, but last year I only had two, and they said, 'You think this is too expensive? Tough.'"

If you're planning on refashioning your space according to your own vision (and isn't that the point?), you embark on another epic quest: construction. "If you think it might cost $4 million, plan on it being $5.5 million," says Barclay. "Nothing goes according to plan."

Errol Apostolopoulos, owner of the Place, is currently overseeing renovations of a second bar that will occupy the space of the former Polly Esther's, near the FleetCenter. Dubbed the Greatest Bar, it's expected to open before the Democratic National Convention. "One of the things that's been an eye-opener for me is that this has been a major construction project," says Apostolopoulos. "Architects, contractors, city permits—it's a long process."

But after you've conquered all these obstacles and you're ready to open, you can kick back and relax, right? Not exactly. "Once you open, basically the only time you're not there is when you're sleeping," Apostolopoulos says. "You're taking deliveries, fixing things, hosting people, managing staff, answering questions and handling any problems. You're your own marketing, accounting and purchasing department. At the end of the day, you're doing your receipts. Your first year is very hands-on, and there's very little down time." The fun, says Apostolopoulos, comes later, when the owner can relax a bit and enjoy the fruits of his labor. "The social aspect of owning a bar is nice," he says. "It's a means of seeing your friends and staying in contact. If people are in town, they stop by. Hosting parties and events—that stuff's very fun. And in my case, I did it with friends of mine, and I get a lot of enjoyment out of that."

"It's fun owning a bar, but it's a lot of work," says the Rack's Barclay. "Virtually any bar in Boston is for sale, if the price is right." Even his? "Hey, I'm getting old..."

GAETANO "GUY" TURCO

THE WATERFRONT CAFÉ
450 COMMERCIAL ST., BOSTON, 617-523-0613
MON.–SAT. VARYING DAYS AND NIGHTS

What Alberto Tomba was to skiing, or Mario Andretti to racing cars, Turco is to bartending. A native of Sicily, he was raised in Turin, Italy, and got his start in the business at the tender age of 9, working at a place his brother owned in an Italian ski resort. With his Mediterranean charm going full blast, he can turn a room full of surly Bostonians into a crowd of convivial confreres worthy of Carnevale in Venice. With an uncanny knack for knowing a customer's drink before he even walks through the door, Turco is the quintessential North End guy—warm, welcoming and genuine. Bonus points for his accent, which makes even bad news sound OK.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Guy Martini
1½ oz. Hypnotique, ½ oz. Grey Goose Vodka, 1½ oz. Grand Marnier. Shake on ice and strain into a martini glass. Garnish with a cherry.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Prima Rosa
1 part each Stoli Strasberi, lemoncello, lemonade and soda water, with a splash of cranberry. Serve on ice in a tulip glass. Garnish with a lemon wedge.

NATHAN HUGHES

PARISH CAFÉ
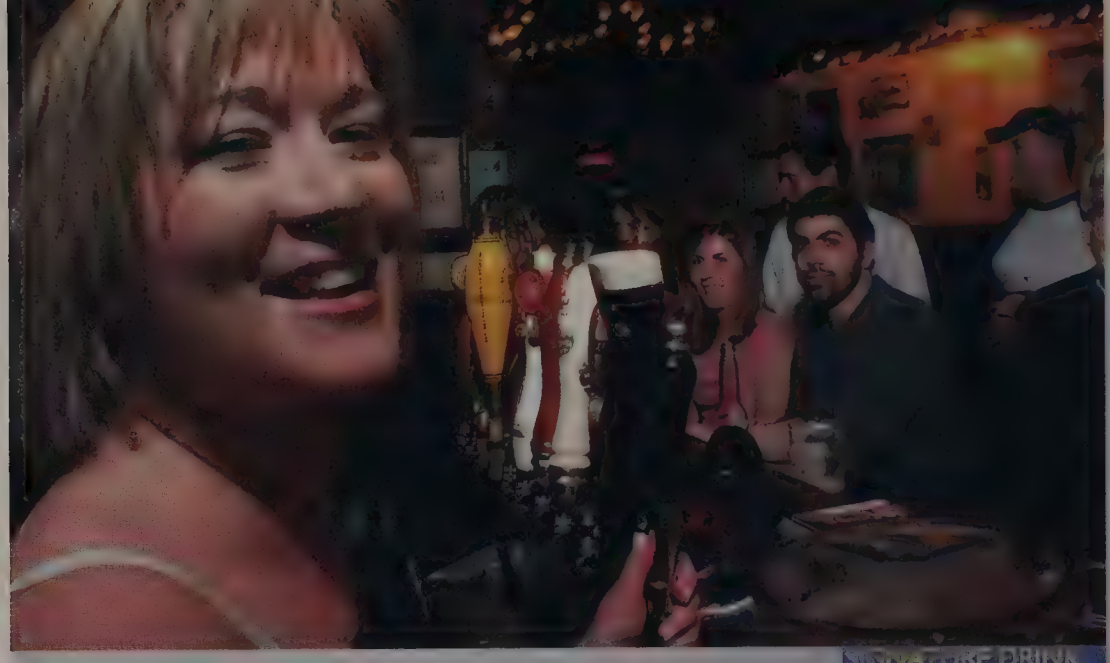
MON., WED., FRI. NIGHTS; SUN. DAYS

An army brat raised in upstate New York, Hughes came to Boston to play bass with a band and has also busked in T stations. Although he began tending bar as a way to support his musical aspirations, this self-described "6'1" bald guy with glasses" quickly fell in love with the business and has been plying his trade for the past eight years, first at Big City in Allston and now at one of Back Bay's most enduringly popular hangouts. Catering to a mix of local office drones, tourists, the pre- and post-theater crowd and employees of such nearby restaurants as Grill 23 and Excelsior, Hughes adapts his style to suit each customer who sits down at his bar, assessing within 30 seconds of their arrival whether they want a butler, a buddy or simply to be left alone. With a pop culture IQ in the genius range, he's able to elevate small talk to a higher level in the time it takes to down a draft. "There are so many bars to choose from in Boston," he says, "so you have to give 'em a reason to come back." Like swallows returning to Capistrano, Hughes' regulars return again and again.



SIGNATURE DRINK

Schnossberry Martini
Equal parts Stoli Razberi and Stoli Ohranj, ¼ oz. Midori and a splash of cranberry and pineapple juice. Shake on ice and serve straight up in a martini glass. Garnish with an orange slice.

GARY MURAD
DILLON'S
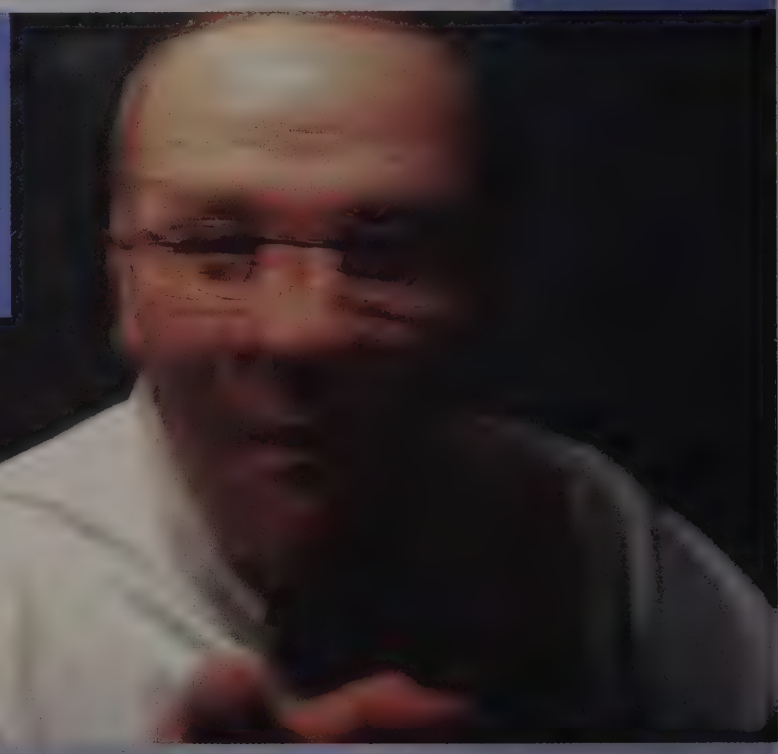
FRI. NIGHTS

Surprisingly, Murad claims he's not the only bartender he knows with two graduate degrees. A native of Framingham, he has an M.B.A. and a law degree and works by day as a lobbyist, schmoozing the legislators on Beacon Hill. The thrill of being behind the bar (a job he initially took to help pay for grad school) has blossomed into an abiding passion, and whatever direction his career takes, Murad doesn't see himself ever giving up entirely on his sideline. "It's a social outlet, with the fringe benefit of making some money," he says. "I'd be out anyway, so I might as well be doing something worthwhile." He sees bartending in terms of performing: "It's exactly the same as being an actor or a musician or a comedian. Your job is to entertain." Besides dispensing hospitality with a theatrical flair, he's like Speedy Gonzalez behind the bar, and his cocktails are consistently perfect.

BERNIE KEAVENEY
BRENDAN BEHAN PUB
378 CENTRE ST., JAMAICA PLAIN, 617-522-5386
TUE., WED. DAYS; FRI., SAT. NIGHTS; SUN. DAYS



This Irish import (from County Roscommon) has the energy of a 100-megaton warhead, and her staccato, machine-gun style of talking matches her rabbit-like swiftness with the beverages. Working with two men, she's the only woman behind the bar. But she can more than hold her own with the guys. Able to take it as well as she dishes it out, she has a superb sense of humor, and a first-time visitor to her bar becomes a fan for life. In fact, some of her regulars schlep all the way from Cambridge to see her, and if that isn't high praise, we don't know what is.

SIGNATURE DRINK

Nuts and Berries
Equal parts Baileys Irish Cream, Chambord, Frangelico, Stoli Razberi and Kahlua. Shake on ice and serve as a shot.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Pure Whore
Equal parts Stoli Vanil, Malibu Rum and pineapple juice. Shake on ice and serve as a shot.

TERRY NIXON
MR. DOOLEY'S BOSTON TAVERN
FRI., SAT., SUN., TUE. NIGHTS

Imagine the friendliest person you've ever met. Now, multiply by a factor of 10 and add a thick Irish accent. That's simply the tip of the iceberg when it comes to Nixon's charm. A native of a small town called Athlone, he greets customers at this Financial District bar with such endearingly folksy truisms as "Every day above ground is a good day." He genuinely can't seem to believe his good fortune at earning a living "simply by talking to people." The gilded tongue and a sympathetic ear mean he's privy to patrons' deepest, darkest secrets, and he admits, "I hear a lot of love stories," although he declines to elaborate: "That's why they're called secrets." Besides being the soul of discretion and never betraying a confidence, he's known for his verbal pyrotechnics and his ability to pick up a conversation exactly where it left off, even if it was six months ago. His customers, many of them business travelers staying at nearby hotels, return regularly for that reason, and grateful patrons have sent postcards and T-shirts from as far away as Morocco to thank him for his hospitality. Add to that a gift for pulling a good pint of Guinness and a knack for flushing out unsavory characters without anyone noticing, and it's obvious why everyone considers him aces.

VOX POPULI
755 BOYLSTON ST., BOSTON,
617-424-8300
WED.–SAT. NIGHTS

Always the most jovial guy in the room, Ryder is a full-time dad to his two children and the elder statesman among his coworkers, who call him "Switzerland" because of his neutrality. "The world is so chaotic," he says. "Hopefully, my little stretch of bar provides an oasis of calm for my customers." His regulars tend to be the young and the restless—not to mention good-looking, successful and well-dressed—who flock to this Copley Square watering hole. With the finesse of a seasoned pro and the enthusiasm of a rookie, Ryder sees to his customers' needs and frequently uses them as guinea pigs, offering tastes of his newest concoction to grateful patrons. Skilled at relating to whomever bellies up to his bar, he's like Willy Wonka, making tasty treats for an adoring clientele.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Clear Crantini
1½ oz. Finlandia Cranberry Vodka, ¾ oz. each Finlandia Lime Vodka and Triple Sec, 2 oz. white cranberry juice. Shake on ice and strain into a frosted martini glass. Garnish with a lime wedge and 3 floating cranberries.

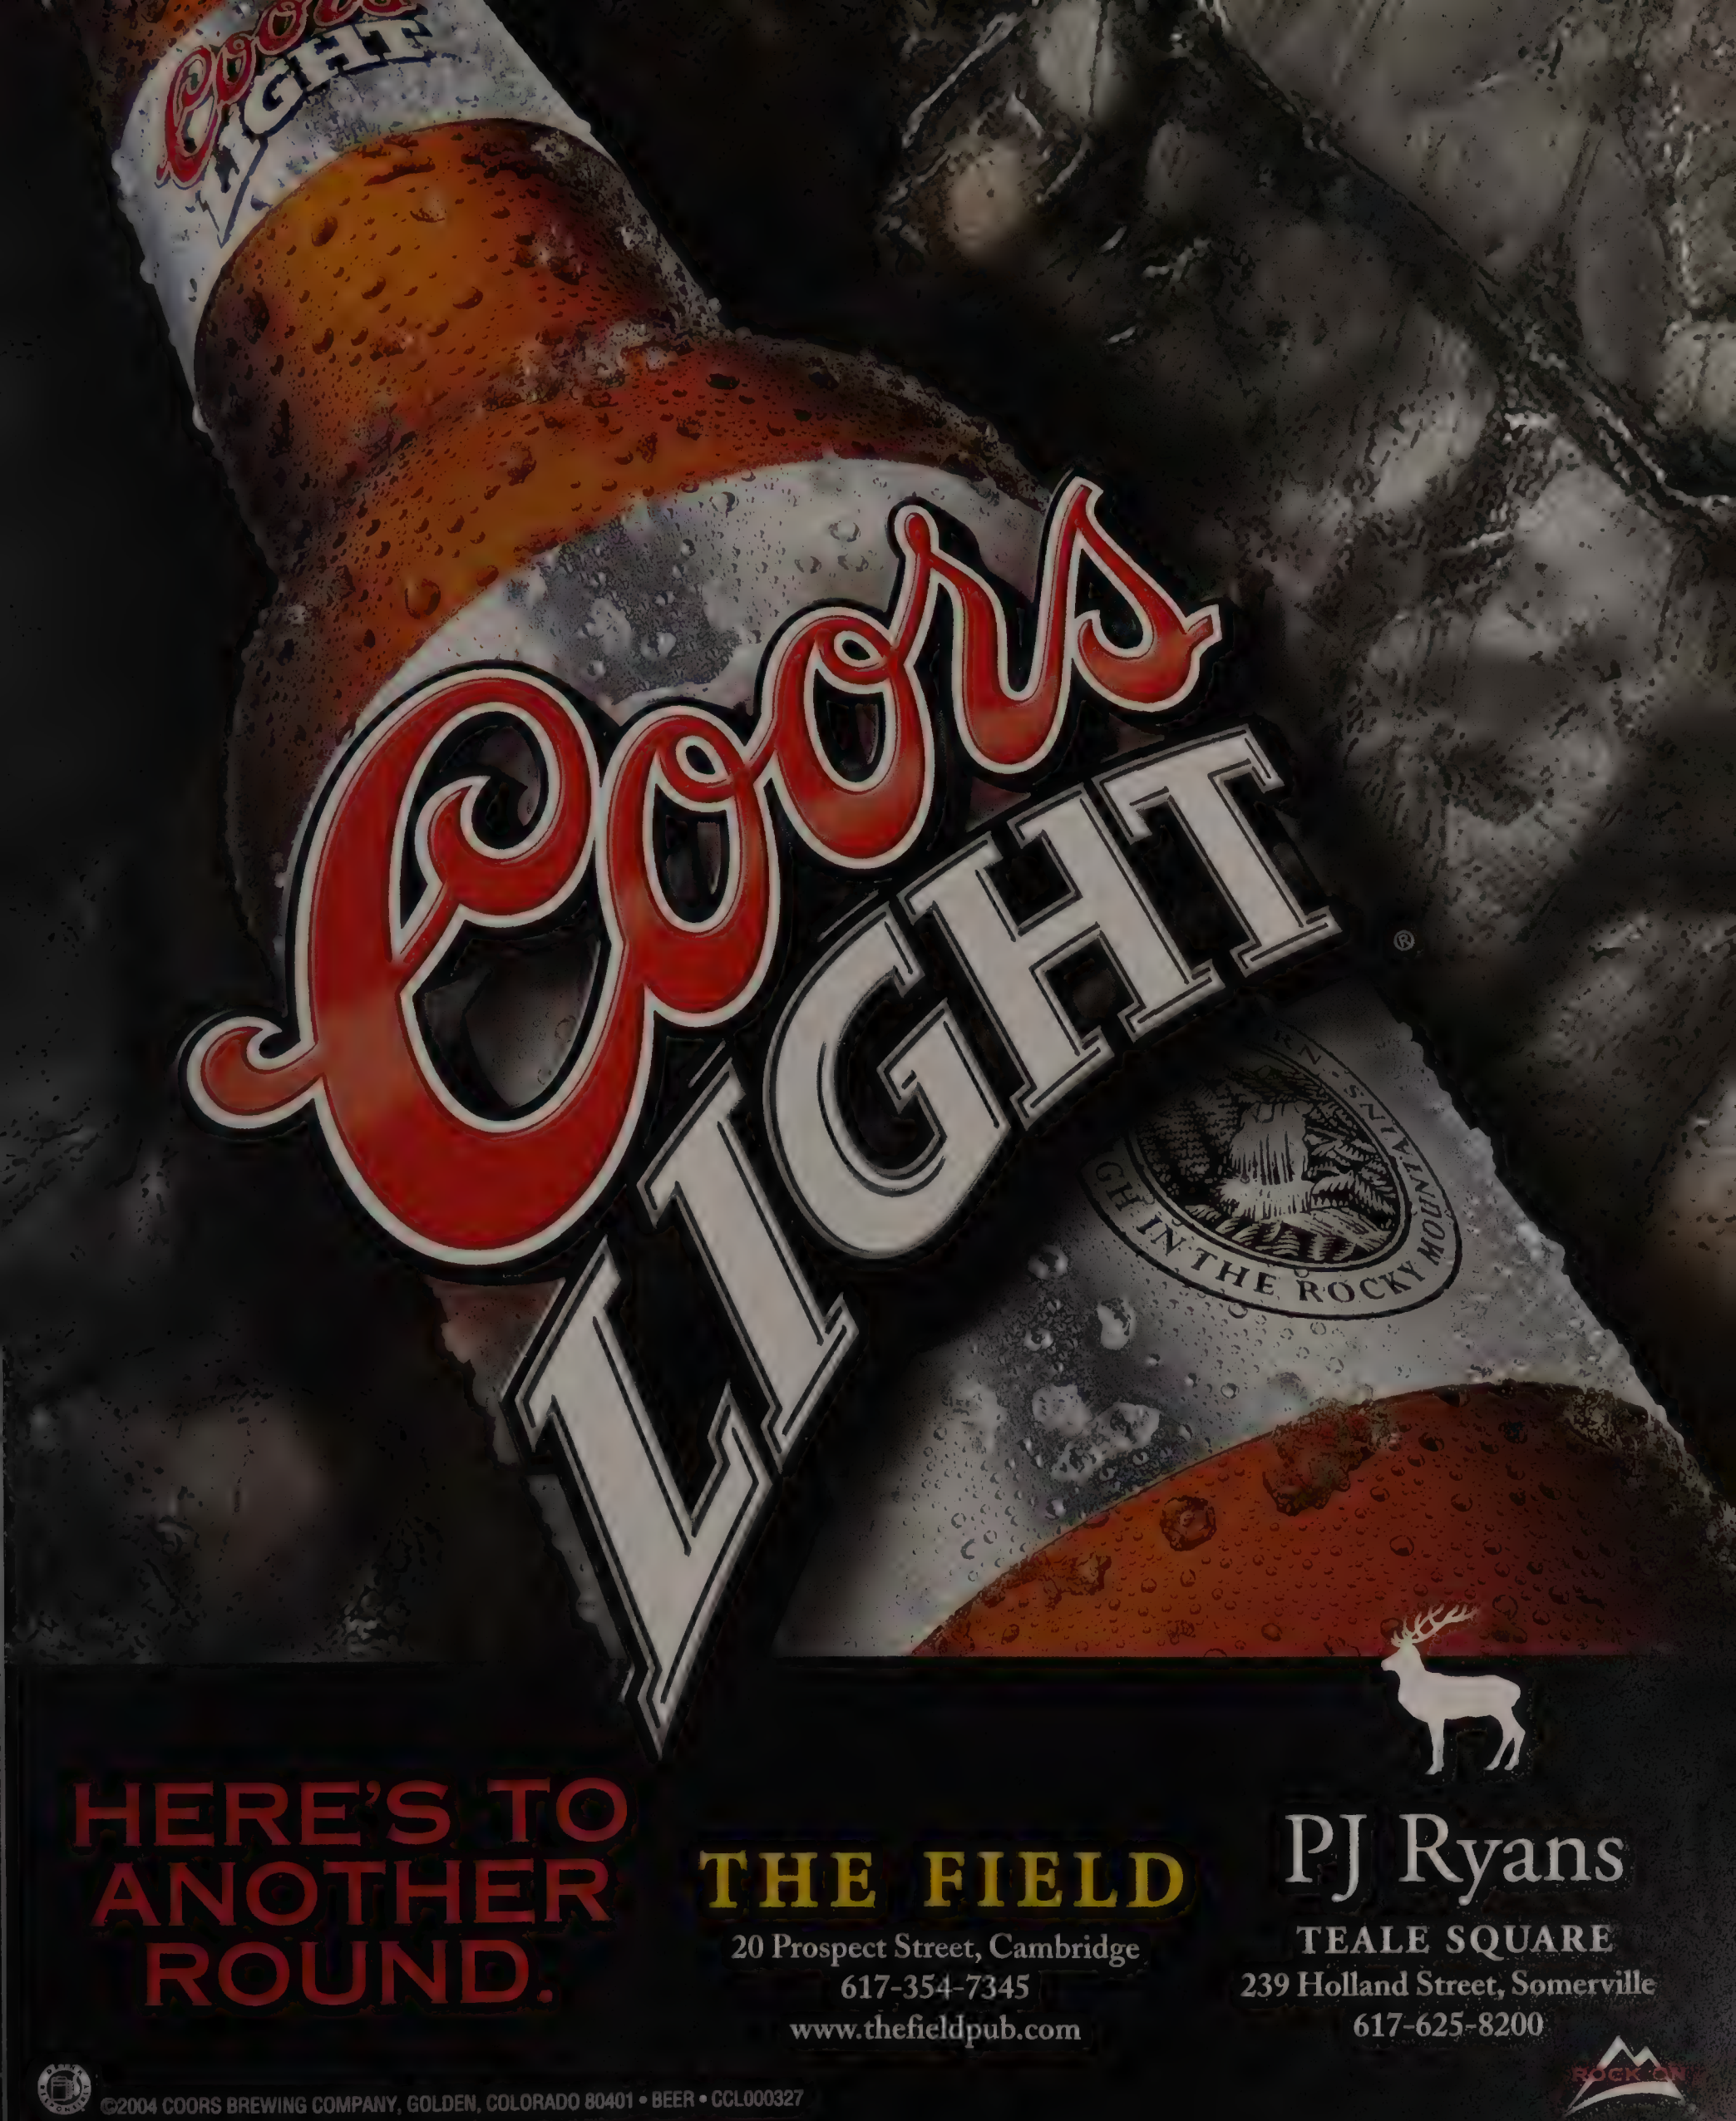
Equal parts Midori, Peach Schnapps, Malibu Rum, Southern Comfort, amaretto, sloe gin and pineapple juice. Shake on ice and serve as a shot.

PETER LEROY
THE PURPLE SHAMROCK
1 UNION ST., BOSTON,
617-227-2060
MON., FRI., SAT. NIGHTS



By day, LeRoy works with learning-disabled sixth-graders as a teacher's assistant with Boston Public Schools. By night, he ministers to thirsty adults at this downtown hot spot. Both callings require the patience of Job and outstanding interpersonal skills, and the similarities between dealing with unruly kids and handling rowdy after-work and weekend crowds aren't lost on him. Lightning-fast with a comeback or an amusing one-liner, he has a smile and a handshake for everyone when time permits but maintains eye contact with customers even when the bar is slammed. He's also a pro at getting the social ball rolling; when a pretty girl comes in, he won't hesitate to put her drink on a regular's tab, without asking, and tell her, "That guy over there bought this for you." Able to handle six orders (or 12–18 drinks) at a time, he's like an alcohol assembly line. What could be better than a wing-man who dispenses drinks?

JUSTINE KURLAND SANCTUARY
189 STATE ST., BOSTON, 617-573-9333
MON., FRI., SAT. NIGHTS

Vivacious and flirtatious, this lovely and lively young lady oversees the good times at the newest hot spot in Faneuil Hall, which (despite its location) attracts an upscale crowd of young, well-dressed professionals. Having graduated from Tufts (with a degree in economics) in 2002, Kurland has been behind the bar only a few years but already has the chops of a seasoned professional. Known for her fashion flair ("I'm all about the glitter and sparkles"), she has adapted Sanctuary's all-black uniform with her trademark tuxedo pants. Not surprisingly, she's constantly getting hit on, which she says is just an occupational hazard. But not even persistent Lotharios can dampen her high spirits. Delightful, delectable, delovely.

SIGNATURE DRINK

The Sanctuary Martini
Two parts Cîroc Vodka to one part white grape juice. Shake on ice and serve in a martini glass with a white-grape-sugared rim. Garnish with a red grape.

SEAN MCKEOWN

THE FIREPLACE
1634 BEACON ST., BROOKLINE, 617-975-1900
WED.–FRI. NIGHTS

It's a testament to McKeown's talents that some devotees from his previous gigs at Grill 23, the Parish Café and the Good Life Cambridge make the trek all the way out to Brookline just to see him. While building up a telecommunications business with his brother, he started bartending at night, but two years ago decided to leave the corporate world for good and pursue a higher calling. Managing the bar at this suburban American bistro with a decidedly downtown ambience, he can crank out the drinks like a madman when there's a band performing (Wednesday and Thursday nights), although he's equally capable of carrying on an intelligent conversation when the bar is quiet. "I should be writing an advice column," he says, "with all the personal stuff—relationship problems, work angst—that people tell me about." Three times a year, he comes up with a new and original cocktail menu, and he can offer the expertise of a sommelier without the meaningless claptrap. Capable, courteous and cordial, not to mention super-cute, he's everything you'd want in a buddy or a boyfriend, let alone a bartender.

THE WORST-CASE SCENARIO BAR GUIDE

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Under normal circumstances, a bar is a safe and hassle-free oasis in which to relax and enjoy a few pops. But bad things can happen to good barflies. Accordingly, we offer the following tips to help you cope with sticky situations.

What do you do if…

A fight breaks out?

Bar brawls have been romanticized to a fare-thee-well in films and television, which make them look like wacky, bottle-smashing fun. But the truth is that they usually result in bodily injury and/or a night spent in the drunk tank at the police station. No matter how bulletproof liquor makes you feel, try not to get involved, especially when bottles and pool cues are brandished as weapons. Instead, quietly and unobtrusively make your way to the nearest exit, and congratulate yourself for your Ghandi-like pacifism…and for having skipped out on a bar tab for a perfectly legitimate reason.

It's time to pay the bill and you realize you don't have any money?

Everyone forgets his or her wallet once in a while, but if you find that this happens more than, say, two or three times in a decade, you might be just a parasitic scum-sucking schnorrer. On the other hand, when this happens and it's not your habit, there are a few graceful ways to handle the situation. One is to leave something valuable behind (perhaps a piece of jewelry, or your fiancée) while you retrieve the necessary funds. Another is to offer some form of in-kind service. But no matter how cute the bartender is, we suggest you steer clear of offering sexual favors, as this is what is universally known as prostitution.

Some truly awful person is hitting on you and won't go away?

Few of us have not been the objects of unwanted attention by persistent barroom admirers. When polite but subtle hints (like, "I'd rather chew glass") fail to dissuade them, you have two choices: You can leave, which means that boorish behavior prevails, or you can borrow a page from the insect kingdom and make like the stinkbug, letting out a pungent and unmistakable fart. The only downside to this approach is that no one else is likely to find you alluring for the rest of the evening.

Your friend is hitting on a woman who's actually a man?

While it may be amusing to you to watch your dimwitted buddy chat up the unusually tall woman with the prominent Adam's apple, the situation can quickly devolve into an ugly Crying Game scenario, and it's your job to intervene. At an opportune moment, quietly remind your friend that no real woman has ever found him remotely that interesting, and point out all the telltale signs that she is a he. If all else fails, wait until "she" excuses herself to use the bathroom and tactfully explain that, while undeniably lovely, she is probably standing up to pee.

You find a cockroach floating in your cocktail?

Don't make a scene. As the old joke goes, be quiet or everyone else will want one. Instead of causing a ruckus, subtly alert the bartender and explain to him that you won't mention it to a soul if he introduces you to the hot blonde at the end of the bar.

The Red Sox are playing and there's no TV?

There is no known solution to this problem. Leave at once.

WISDOM OF THE AGES

A Walk on the Beach*, by Joan Anderson, is a memoir of a woman's year alone on the Cape and her friendship with her elderly mentor.

Writer Joan Anderson found herself at a crossroads in her marriage, and so took off for a year of solitude and contemplation on Cape Cod. But an unexpected—or extremely fated—encounter changed her plans. No, it wasn't an affair. Rather, on the rocky beach she met Joan Erikson, wife of the eminent psychologist Erik Erikson, who chronicled life's psychological stages. In her 90s, yet still bohemian, free-spirited and emotionally adventuresome, Erikson became Anderson's mentor and friend. Calling upon her past as a dancer and her collaborative psychological work with Erik, Joan E. encouraged Joan A. to embrace her instinctual, intuitive, bodily self, to see the world through unjaded eyes and to take risks. Inspired by Erikson's recommendation to grab life's delicious mud and get dirty, Anderson eventually hiked the Inca Trail in Peru. In the course of exploring her own final, but still stretching years, Erikson (who died in 1997) helped her younger friend leap into interesting voids. A Walk on the Beach documents a sort of free-floating friendship therapy, part wise-woman mentoring, part two girls laughing on the beach together, even if one of them is 94 years old.

ASIA ON MY MIND

Keiko, at 121 Charles St., sells fine Japanese handcrafts. Call 617-725-2888 or go to www.keikogallery.com.

Keiko is a haven of tranquility (its phone number even ends in the Japanese lucky number 8). A prominent aesthetic in the shop is lacquer, a substance so lusciously rare that one tree produces a single cup of it per year, then rests for 13 years. An extraordinary lacquered table with exotic asymmetrical patterns painted on it is a work of art, beautiful yet of a knockable hardness; it was sap-saturated 45 times to achieve its durable glow. Elsewhere, an enduring red lipstick kiss appears in lacquered bowls and in ringingly pure jewelry. Necklaces hang from a black cord, a single red circle or square echoing earrings in similar designs. Lacquer also forms the surface of a flat painting of a boy and girl, made of decorative papers. Another evocative painting is of a red kimono blowing in the wind. Glass, very intricately cut, appears in little blue sauce dishes for ceremonial occasions and in an impressively enormous, glinting bowl that demands its own domain for presentation. A tiny glass orchestra—sold separately or in its entirety—features musicians barely three inches tall. Keiko also sells lamps made of skinny, yellowish, dried gourds decorated with pinhole patterns that shed light with great delicacy.

ME, MY MUSCLES AND I

Rexercise, at 283-A Mount Auburn St. in Watertown, provides one-on-one personal-training in a private studio. Trainer Rex Baird has an extensive background in health and sports. Call 617-923-0010 to schedule a free consultation.

Imagine going to see your personal trainer without having to travel through a hot gym full of roiling sweaty people. At Rex Baird's Rexercise, you go into "your" room, to work out on the impressive, efficient equipment.

Baird, a former neuromuscular massage therapist, has also gone on his own extensive exercise odysseys. He's run 65 marathons and has competed in the high jump and weightlifting, among other sports, and he knows what's worked and what hasn't. He describes his evolved theory of optimum activity, which involves resistance training that will help you build precious muscle while shedding fat. If you only diet, without working out, you sacrifice muscle; the same holds true if your only exercise is aerobics. Baird comically imitates the stance of modern Computer Man, Cro-Magnon division, feebly hunched and slouched, head leaning forward. Then he leans against the wall, palms flattened to illustrate the correct alignment: ears over the shoulders over the hips over the ankles. Inspiringly healthy Baird and his sleek machinery address the varying needs of golfers, runners and anyone else, using slow, controlled movements, and updating your program as you progress. "Biomarkers"—muscle mass, strength, basal metabolic rate, and body fat percentage—are the operative measurements that will mark your goals.

SHELLFISH DESIRES

With B&G Oysters, Barbara Lynch opens a pearl on Tremont Street

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY BERTA A. DANIELS

Barbara Lynch is one of a handful of celebrated restaurant owner/chefs who grace our city. Her No. 9 Park, which lies in the shadow of Bulfinch's gold-domed capitol building on Beacon Hill, is near the top of everyone's short list of upscale, cutting-edge Boston restaurants. Now Lynch has applied her energy, flair and expertise to two quite different restaurants in the South End: B&G Oysters Ltd. and the Butcher Shop. As their names suggest, these eateries focus on seafood and meat respectively, and adherents of the Atkins regime will find a welcome bill of fare in each. This week I explore the charms of B&G, which turns out impeccably fresh fish and shellfish, creatively and skillfully prepared and attractively presented in a lively, warm and hospitable environment. (In the next issue I will address B&G's meaty sibling, the Butcher Shop.)

Fried oysters with homemade tartar sauce

Ensconced on the corner of Tremont and Waltham streets in the South End, B&G Oysters—co-owned by Lynch and her longtime manager Garrett Harker—occupies but a few hundred square feet of space just below street level. A smart, white marble bar, which seats almost 20 diners, wraps around the open, stainless steel kitchen, in which constantly moving, no-nonsense line cooks juggle frying pans and adjust garnishes with truly remarkable agility and energy. The restaurant's clever, ergonomic design and effective use of space enable the young, energetic staff to negotiate the tight spaces with efficiency and grace. Small tiles cover one wall and part of the ceiling, with intricately recessed paneling defining the remainder. A large bay window, with seating at a counter for four diners, looks out onto Tremont Street. There are a handful of small tables, the largest of which seats up to eight, around the periphery of the restaurant.

B&G's food starts out on the right foot with excellent, hard-crusted French rolls—the product of Frank McClelland's Sel de la Terre bakery—accompanied by sweet-salty soft butter. As befits its name, B&G features a large selection of fresh oysters on the half shell. The list of these creatures from near and far—Massachusetts and Rhode Island to Prince Edward Island and the Pacific coast—changes daily, ensuring freshness and variety. At $2 per bivalve, an oyster enthusiast can run up quite a tab, especially if he or she washes them down with wine purchased by the glass.

One need not be a devotee of raw oysters to appreciate B&G, for its menu also offers nine soup, salad and sandwich options; five appetizers; and six main courses consisting of seafood with impeccably fresh and flavorful vegetable garnishes. Spicy salty shrimp ($14), almost a dozen medium-size shrimp, appeared arranged in a row on a small plate with tails up as if standing at attention. Aromatic with sea salt and cayenne and fried to perfect crunchy texture, they were accompanied by provocatively braised bok choy. Moules frites ($13), a dozen and a half plump, sweet mussels steamed with leek and saffron, betrayed a touch of Pernod. Accompanied by hand-cut French fries, the mussels and their starchy companion brought a little Brussels to Boston.

Salade niçoise ($13) exuded Mediterranean warmth and aromas, with pleasantly bitter arugula, extra-virgin olive oil, al dente green beans, hard boiled egg, roast sweet pepper strips, pitted black olives and tiny quarters of firm-textured fingerling potatoes. The star of the ensemble was the sashimi-quality seared tuna, two thick slices, satiny in texture and satisfying in their fresh, pristine flavor. A single white anchovy fillet crowned the masterpiece, so exquisite that I forgave the absence of my favorite niçoise ingredient, capers.

Among main courses, the baked scrod with black truffled crust ($18) vied with the sea scallops for bragging rights. Served on a pool of slightly salty celeriac puree and garnished with sautéed spinach, carrots, turnips and Brussels sprouts, the cod boasted firm, flaky yet moist flesh inside a subtly flavored crust. Broiled sea scallops ($20) brought four huge, sweet, tender scallops of perfect texture, not really broiled but rather seared in hot butter to a rich golden brown color, served on a yellow carrot puree with two or three varieties of woodsy, earthy wild mushrooms. Choosing a favorite between the scallops and cod proved impossible.

The last main course I tried, the Maine lobster roll, fetched the menu's top price, $22. It consisted of a cold salad of meaty chunks of tail and knuckle meat, tossed with a blend of herbs that enhanced rather than obscured the sweet lobster flavor, with nuggets of crunchy celery thrown in for texture counterpoint. As good as the salad was, I was disappointed, since I had been expecting warm, sautéed buttered lobster. Advised that the lobster roll would be accompanied by more of the French fries, I passed on them, and my waiter offered to substitute sautéed vegetables instead. In the preparation of its vegetables as well as its scallops, B&G deploys butter by the tablespoon, with delicious if artery-clogging results.

Buttery indulgence notwithstanding, I was not about to go without dessert. Warm

My dining experiences at B&G were enhanced by the raciousness of its staff. B&G ccepts reservations only for arties of four or more. As a esult, my wife and I arrived ithout a reservation. Four Seasons and an Island

The Aujourd'hui of tomorrow… Bubbling Well runs dry…

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

When former executive chef Ed Gannon left the Four Seasons Hotel several months ago, food and beverage manager Sam Ionnides says, virtually every top chef in Boston expressed an interest in the plum position. So who will fill the big clogs when Aujourd'hui reopens in June?

He's Jerome Legras, a 29-year-old Frenchman who was most recently executive chef at the Four Seasons Tokyo and who, Ionnides claims, "can make cabbage explode in your mouth." Not literally, we hope. Anyway, after extensive renovations that include an expansion of the bar, installation of wood herringbone floors, new tapestries and reconfigured seating, the new Aujourd'hui will serve only dinner and Sunday brunch. Ionnides sums up the new decor as "simple elegance, not big bobbly things." As for the menu, look for an emphasis on whatever's regional and artisanal, from carefully sourced, locally grown fruits and vegetables to line-caught fish.

Former Four Seasons chef Ed Gannon is readying Lure on the Vineyard.

SECOND COURSE…

Meanwhile, in a galaxy far, far away—ok, Martha's Vineyard—Gannon is preparing to open the new restaurant Lure at the Winnetu Inn & Resort. Although he acknowledges "a little bit of culture shock," Gannon says he's happy with his decision to leave the city's fast pace for the more leisurely island life.

Does he miss the Boston hotel where he worked for more than 10 years? "You know, I haven't for a second, and I loved it there," he says. "This is challenging and exciting in different ways, something I've always wanted to do." At Lure, which will open for weekend dinner in mid April, Gannon and his wife Michelle—a former manager at The Catered Affair—will offer family-friendly fine dining in an 80-seat ocean-view dining room. Meanwhile, he'll move his family into a house in Oak Bluffs. And he's ready for the inevitable: "My wife said we needed to make sure our house is big enough for guests, and I reminded her we work for an inn," he says with a laugh.

Seriously, isn't there anything he misses about Boston? "Chinese food," says Gannon. "One good Chinese restaurant on the island would be monumental, maybe one that delivers…but then everyone would move out here."

Shanghaied? In Cambridge's Porter Square, Pho Republique owner Jack Bardy had the dining room half filled with furnishings and decor shipped from China for the restaurant he expected to open in the former Metro space. Suddenly, plans for the forthcoming Bubbling Well fell through, and now Rustic Kitchen plans to open its first Cambridge outpost in the space in June. Executive chef Bill Bradley and chef de cuisine Jacob Aecio will adapt the menu to suit Cantabrigian tastes. (The ambitious Rustic Kitchen folks are also opening an RK in Hingham this summer). Meanwhile, Bardy has put his furnishings in storage and is seeking another Cambridge location.

If annoyance at Atkins acolytes is driving you to doughnuts, stop! There's a far more rational response. At blu in The Sports Club/LA, chef Dante deMagistris, who creates gnocchi fit for the gods, is now serving a new Look Good, Feel Good menu at lunch. The three-course $22 menu changes weekly and features low-fat techniques such as grilling, steaming, and poaching, and ingredients such as olive oil, egg whites and yogurt instead of butter and cream.

Finally, when will Ed Doyle, restaurant consultant at large and former Aura chef, open Haven? According to Doyle, the process of opening his own restaurant is moving along, but is "still in snail mode." iB

WINE

Crunchy Wines

BY SANDY BLOCK M.W.

I wanted to like them, I really did. But my first experiences with so-called organic wines in the 1980s were more about pain than pleasure. The whites were brown, nasty and undrinkable, the reds a shade better but still uniformly weird, with aggressive, alien flavors. The overall impression was that they all tasted more like the results of a failed home winemaking experiment than anything else. So my standard response for a long time when presented with an organic wine was, "No thanks. I'm actually not that thirsty."

Things have changed, however. Originally inspired by the organic food movement as a reaction against industrial agriculture, new methods of grape growing that avoid the use of artificial herbicides, pesticides and fertilizers keep gaining more adherents each year. This is especially true in parts of California, where some of the major associations of growers and producers are adopting a code of "sustainable wine-growing practices." This is a catchphrase for a set of procedures that are becoming mainstream, including avoidance of sprays, use of beneficial predators in the vineyards to eliminate insect pests, and composting. The inspiration for some growers is philosophical, but the greater number of organically inspired grape-growers appear convinced that better-tasting fruit results from healthy vines planted in minimally treated soils that teem with diverse populations of micro-organisms.

The center of this movement is in northern California's Mendocino County—a rural area directly north of Napa and Sonoma where a majority of the vineyard acreage is now "green"—and in Oregon, where a quarter of the grape crop is certified organic. To be clear, there are still very few organic wines (an estimated 20 out of California's more than 1,000 wineries use the designation), but an increasing amount of acreage is devoted to organic cultivation. Although they are sometimes lumped together, there's a difference, in the U.S. at least, between "organic wine" and "wine made from organically grown grapes."

In the past the definitions were muddy, but the biggest news recently is that since October 2002, use of the term "organic" in relation to both wine and food has been subject to uniform federal standards. "Organic" wine must not only be made from grapes originating in organically farmed vineyards, but the key supplementary requirement is that sulfites cannot be added at any point in the production process. Sulfur dioxide is a general preservative, antibacterial and anti-oxidant agent and its use has become standard in the wine industry because it helps stabilize wine, brighten its color and maintain clean flavors. In particular, it's very difficult to make a white wine that tastes fresh without adding at least some minimal sulfites at the grape crush.

So while true organic wine remains a curiosity, more and more bottles are appearing with the awkward terminology "made with organically grown grapes" on the label. For this category, sulfur dioxide additions are permitted, within acceptable limits. So you know you're getting a wine made according to environmentally sound grape-growing techniques, even if some sulfur has been added to keep it sound. But here's a confusing piece of the overall picture: American rules, clear as they are, have not been aligned with European Union regulations, which allow use of the term "organic wine" on bottles made from grapes grown organically even if there are additions of sulfur.

The reality is that sulfur dioxide is a naturally occurring compound that can be present in wine in substantial quantities even if no sulfites are added. The FDA regulated sulfites in 1986 after a correlation was found between asthmatic reactions and sulfites found in salad bar vegetables, and the amount used in virtually any wine today is minimal. Still, extremely sensitive asthmatics may experience a reaction to even small traces of sulfites.

Demand for wine made from organically grown grapes appears to be growing as an offshoot of our desire for a more healthful lifestyle and as an adjunct to the dynamic natural-food movement. There are still lingering feelings that, at least when it comes to wine, "organic" equals "strange," but this is dissipating as the trend becomes more widespread. The key point is that there is a difference between organic wine and wine made from organically grown grapes; many of the former are still what I would consider in a transitional phase, working out some of the details, while wines in the latter category not only make you feel good but usually taste delicious too. And that ultimately is the major reason to pay attention to what's on the label: to help you find a bottle whose flavors you're going to enjoy. IB

Let the Exhibitionism Begin

We didn't need Paris Hilton to tell us there's quite a market for homemade porn out there. You Oughta Be in Pictures, the amateur adult film festival sponsored by Brookline sexuality boutique Grand Opening, has screened to sold-out audiences since its debut five years ago. If you caught last year's event on HBO's Real Sex Presents: Porn 101 XXXtra Credit, you know why. Filmmakers and their voyeuristic compatriots gather at the Coolidge Corner Theatre to watch a blush-worthy two-hour reel of risque festival submissions. Grand Opening proprietrix Kim Airs (in photo) presides over the evening's festivities, which end with a collective sigh of relief when Airs dramatically destroys the tape—only two copies are made, one for each show—to guard against unwanted circulation. Coolidge Corner Theatre, 290 Harvard St., Brookline (617-731-2626). April 5, 9:30 pm; April 10, 12 am. $12, 18+. www.grandopening.com.

CityScope: Liberal Line-Up

The impassioned coalition of community-based advocacy organizations known as the Boston Social Forum has been gearing up for its pre-DNC gathering July 23–25, where it plans to take on a thorough range of social and political issues—discrimination, poverty, the environment, foreign policy and globalization. The BSF is drawing support from all kinds of activists, from local lefty luminaries Howard Zinn and Noam Chomsky (who sit on the advisory board) to activist and author Angela Davis (who is coming to the summer forum) to heaps of local musicians. Chomsky is the "headliner" at an upcoming BSF gathering—this time a show at the Middle East that will feature an array of music and discussion about social change. The line-up: jazz/spoken word artist Shadowbox, alterna-folk rocker Michelle Shocked, hip-hopper Jake the Snake, Latin outfit Rumba Cuatro, folk signer David Rovics and local rock outfit the Reagan Babies. It'll set you back $10. www.bostonsocialforum. org. Middle East Downstairs, 472/480 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-782-2313). 4-8 pm. $10. 18+.

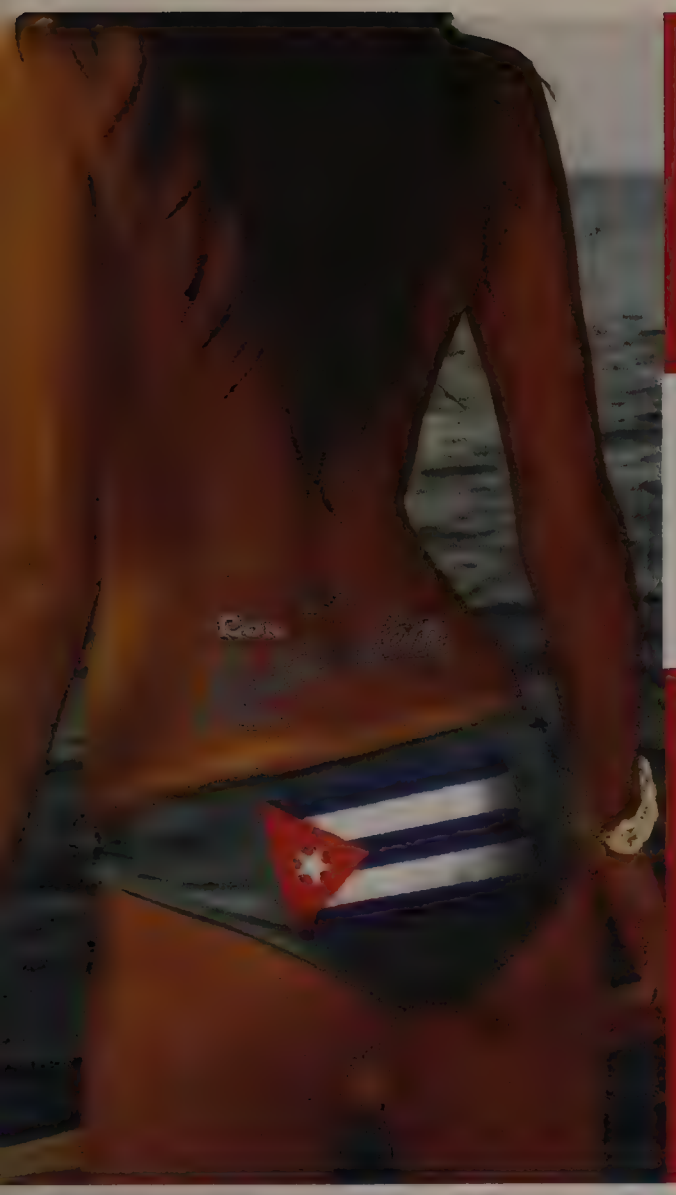
TUE./APRIL 13

Pro-Chocolate

Some cynic (albeit a scientific one) once said that chemically speaking, being in love is no different than consuming large quantities of chocolate. If that's the case, attendees should be feeling good (and possibly generous) at the NARAL Pro-Choice Massachusetts Chocolate Madness fund-raiser. Chocoholics should come prepared for a sugar rush from the all-you-can-eat buffet of dark, semi-sweet and milk chocolaty tarts, cookies and cream puffs prepared and donated by more than 30 local pastry chefs from the Belgian Truffle House, Christina's Ice Cream, L'Espalier, the Fireplace, Icarus, L.A. Burdick Chocolate, No. 9 Park, Rosie's Bakery and others. Proceeds benefit reproductive choice programs throughout the state. April 13, 7 pm. $45. 539 Tremont St., Boston (617-556-8800 ext. 14). www.prochoicemass.org.

TUE./APRIL 13

Music: Revenge of the N.E.R.D.



Apparently, conquering the worlds of rap and pop wasn't enough for Midas-touch beat-maker-songwriters the Neptunes (Pharrell Williams and Chad Hugo). Not satisfied with writing and producing chart-topping hits for the likes of Jay-Z, Britney Spears, 'N SYNC and Busta Rhymes, the duo decided to extend their creative genius into the world of roc as well, forming the band N.E.R.D. with high school pal Shay. The group's In Search Of. was one of the best rock/soul/R&B albums of 2002, proving that the skills of the William and Hugo aren't limited to top-40 fluff, and its upcoming disc, Fly or Die, is said to be more of the same, but better. The Black Eyed Peas, on the other hand, were once under-ground heroes who couldn't get a break. Adored by critics and loved by their cult fan base, the group was unable to reach a wider audience. Then they added a new member (a hot chick singer), penned a duet with another hot singer (Justin Timberlake), and sud-denly they were on MTV every eight minutes. Now the Black Eyed Peas are huge, but their old fans think they stink. Judge for yourself when they join N.E.R.D. at Avalon. 15 Lansdowne St., Boston (617-423-NEXT).

SAT./APRIL 8

Another 48 Hours

Twenty-four hours down, 24 to go. Besides caffeine, nicotine, maybe a certain Ramones song and hopefully some creativity, we can only imagine what's going through the hopped up minds of 48 Hour Film Project participants when they reach the halfway point. Now in its fourth year, the international filmmaking competition draws legions of camera crews eager to go under the gun and produce a short film—that means writing, shooting, editing and scoring—in exactly 48 hours. Fifteen minutes before the clock starts ticking, genres ranging from mockumentary to horror are raffled off to filmmakers, and each team is given a character, a prop and a line of dialogue that must appear in its production. The 24-city tour lands in Boston on April 2, and directors call "Action!" at 7 pm. See who wins Best of City and a chance to compete nationally for the 48HFP Trophy when the local crews screen their finished products April 8 at the Brattle Theatre. 40 Brattle St., Cambridge (617-876-6837). www.brattlefilm.org.

Affleck and Smith get sentimental in Jersey Girl

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Some of the best movies of the last decade—including Gus Van Sant's To Die For and Steven Soderbergh's Out of Sight—resulted when directors crossed over from independent movies to the mainstream.

Jersey Girl is not one of them.

It's not writer-director Kevin (Clerks) Smith's first wide release. But this story of a hotshot New York publicist who reconnects with "real life" after his wife dies and he's left to raise their baby daughter, is his first PG-13 movie, and his most blatant attempt to hook a general audience.

In Jersey Girl, Ben Affleck plays a hotshot publicist whose life changes when his daughter is born

From Smith's second movie (Mallrats) to his most recent (Jay and Silent Bob Strike Back), studios have occasionally tried to foist his comedy on multiplex audiences. But the films' mild box office results reflect their mixed creative successes, and both can be attributed to the same shortcomings: in-jokes that can turn off those who aren't in the know (and annoy those who are), frequent comic-book immaturity and occasional self-indulgence. Sometimes you get the feeling Smith is making movies to serve only the fans who have his Web site bookmarked.

Aside from a logo for the 10th anniversary of his production company that Miramax let Smith slip into the opening credits, Jersey Girl is less indulgent than other Smith films. But it generally fits the same pattern: some interesting story elements here, some lame storytelling choices there. Ultimately, it yields the same mixed results.

The big difference is that Smith is going for more heart this time. Heart has often been an appealing counterpoint to the raunchy comedy in Smith's earlier movies, with his own recurring character, Silent Bob, sometimes providing it in the rare instances when he talks. Smith almost pulls off this overt gushing in Jersey Girl, and one of the reasons is Ben Affleck, who delays his inevitable slide towards AFLAC commercials with his strong performance.

Affleck plays Ollie Trinke. (Ouch, can we take that name down a notch?) At the movie's start, Ollie is a mid-1990s Manhattan music publicist in love with a book editor (Jennifer Lopez) he soon marries. She dies during childbirth, and with no family to help him out beyond a crusty townie dad (George Carlin) back in New Jersey, Ollie can't juggle his job and his kid. He unwittingly commits career suicide by dissing his client (an unseen, pre-Independence Day Will Smith) and the reporters at a press conference that's running late. He's fired by his own firm and is too much of a laughing stock for anyone else to hire.

Ollie's ongoing dilemma in the story—which jumps ahead to when daughter Gertie (Raquel Castro) is 7 years old—is the choice between trying to reclaim the high life he lost in New York, and embracing the blue-collar life he leads after moving back in with his dad and raising Gertie, who's a precocious charmer.

The exaggerated way Jersey Girl presents Ollie's life before and after "the fall" in such either/or terms is a bit hard to take: either he's in Manhattan at a big firm or in Jersey driving the street sweeper. Doesn't Ollie have any loyal clients? (Hasn't he seen Jerry Maguire?) And why does this slick, well-connected huckster have only one person (his former assistant, played by Jason Biggs) he can appeal to for help getting back in the business? Sure, the interview scene in which Smith regulars Matt Damon and Jason Lee cameo as PR executives who have no intention of giving Ollie a job is funny, but the whole situation is contrived. Yes, Virginia, there is public relations even in New Jersey, and if Ollie tried, he could can no doubt get a job there doing "the only thing I was ever good at," as he describes it.

Affleck and Castro have a playful chemistry, and the performances make up for some of the script's weaknesses, especially in the case of Ollie's new love interest, Maya (Liv Tyler). She's another of Smith's wish-fulfillment women—instead of the hot lesbian (as seen in Chasing Amy), Maya is the hot video clerk who wants to tell you how much she loves porn and masturbating, and wants to jump your bones when she hears you haven't had sex since your wife died. You'd think Smith could come up with something more real in his "grown-up" movie.

But that's Smith for you. Jersey Girl often has oddly appealing touches—like Affleck, Tyler and Castro singing a song from Sweeney Todd at Gertie's school variety show, or the celebrity cameo that influences Ollie's decision whether to head back to Manhattan or stay in New Jersey, as his daughter wants. But just as often, it defaults to the most generic touches, like including bland Fleetwood Mac or Bruce Springsteen songs at "emotional" moments. iB

Jersey Girl ★★

Written and directed by Kevin Smith. With Ben Affleck, Raquel Castro, Liv Tyler, George Carlin and Jennifer Lopez. Rated PG-13. At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.

New Releases

Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind ★★
The latest mindbender written by Charlie Kaufman (Being John Malkovich, Human Nature, Adaptation) is, as always, like an M.C. Escher drawing in which you can't tell always tell which direction things are headed, but you put your faith in the hope that Kaufman will still get his characters to an interesting place. This time, the story about a couple (Jim Carrey, Kate Winslet) who've had their memories wiped of a fizzled relationship but try to rekindle their romantic spark fails to reward that faith. Kaufman bats around interesting ideas about the struggle between science and human urges, but despite the appealing chemistry between the stars, the ride isn't nearly as involving, amusing, layered or cohesive as the metaphysical journeys in Malkovich or Adaptation. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

50 First Dates ★½
What can you say about a movie set in Hawaii with a predominantly reggae soundtrack? (Besides "Hawaii is 4,000 miles away from Jamaica." and "Not all music by darker people from island culture is interchangeable.") The dimwittedness extends far beyond the soundtrack, though. In the first 10 minutes alone, you get animal jokes, kid jokes, the most telegraphed vomiting gag ever committed to film, an old guy who curses and Rob Schneider. After that opening, the rest of the movie doesn't stand a chance. It doesn't deserve one, either. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Fog of War ★★★
In Cambridge moviemaker Errol Morris' series of interviews with former JFK and LBJ secretary of defense Robert McNamara, the shrewd technocrat doesn't unburden himself of any more responsibility for the Vietnam quagmire that occurred under his watch. McNamara is too cagey for that. But Morris finds fertile territory in McNamara's observations on human nature, war and politics. (Morris has subtitled the movie "Eleven Lessons from the Life of Robert S. McNamara.") When McNamara talks about the Vietnam effort failing because the American government didn't know enough to empathize with the Vietnamese, it's hard not to think of Iraq. And when McNamara talks about the moral dilemmas of making decisions in times of strife, he sheds light on all the political crossroads that have turned presidents' heads gray. More than a dry Q&A, Fog unfolds in Morris' typically cinematic style, featuring montages of archival footage, cockeyed camera angles and Philip Glass' churning music. (At Kendall Square, Copley Place and Coolidge Corner.)

The Girl Next Door ★★
Emile Hirsch plays the teen Everyboy well, Elisha Cuthbert is whistle-worthy and Timothy Olyphant shows more life than he ever has before. Still, this is a merely decent (and flagrant) Risky Business knockoff, with the aforementioned trio in the respective Tom Cruise, Rebecca DeMornay and Joe Pantoliano roles. Hirsch plays a smart senior; the naughty babe he fancies (Cuthbert) is a porn star trying to get out of the business; and Olyphant plays her boss, who wants her horizontal on the set again. It's not too easy to connect the knockoff's dots but, to its credit, the film remains watchable. (Opens April 9 at Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Good Bye Lenin! ★★½
A loyal East German goes into a coma just before the Berlin Wall falls, and when she has to lead a stress-free life after she comes to, her son goes to great lengths to make sure she never learns that her Communist country doesn't exist anymore. This great premise yields some amusing moments, but also some disappointing ones. Unlike in Billy Wilder's brilliant One, Two, Three (which covered similar territory after the wall went up), the comedy here never quite hits high gear because the story tempers that comedy with shades of drama. But the characters' family drama never becomes as memorable as the premise. (At Kendall Square and Coolidge Corner.)

Hidalgo ★★★
It's not the most ambitious movie, but this 1890-set adventure earns a lot of goodwill for its old-school desire to please the average moviegoer, and not just a narrow demographic segment. This tale of an American Pony Express rider who enters a prestigious long-distance horse race in the Arabian Peninsula with his trusty mustang is a small breath of fresh air. With an unassuming and appealing Viggo Mortensen as its hero, the movie packs in the Saturday-matinee exotic entertainment of The Scor

ANNO 1366.

ANNO 1366

STELLA ARTOIS

An ex-adult film star (Elisha Cuthbert) makes an entrance into the life of a high school student (Emile Hirsch) in The Girl Next Door pion King, though it doesn't shoot for humor as often. And it conveys a bond between man and horse better than the heavy-handed Seabiscuit did. Although based on a true story, the desert adventure should be taken with a big grain of salt, since it turns out hero Frank T. Hopkins may have told a tall tale or two in his day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Intermission ★★★

Think of it as an Irish version of Scotland's Trainspotting. Sex, drugs and rockin' crime are the main sparks to this comedy, which lights on fire when one foolish Dubliner (Cillian Murphy of 28 Days Later) dumps his dishy girlfriend (Kelly Macdonald of Trainspotting) "as a test," and she promptly moves on to a married man (Michael McElhatton). This dubious act causes a ripple effect that spills into the lives of the married man's wife (Deirdre O'Kane), a surly bus driver (Brian F. O'Byrne), a macho cop dying to be a celebrity (Colm Meaney) and even an out-of-control thief (Colin Farrell). The movie is never as wild again as it is in its opening scene, so there's a steady petering, but the dark comedy usually connects, and it never totally runs out of momentum. (At Copley Place, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

James' Journey to Jerusalem ★★★

In this endearing fable, a wide-eyed, young African goes on a pilgrimage to Jerusalem before he's to become his village's new pastor. But once James (Siyabonga Melongisi Shibe) gets to the Holy Land, he discovers anything but the spiritual Eden he'd expected. Israeli immigration puts him in jail because they think he wants to work illegally, then a shady businessman (Salim Daw) bails him out and puts him to work as a menial laborer with other illegal Africans. James even starts to buy into his new boss's dog-eat-dog philosophy, before his eventual realization that he's lost his spiritual way. Working with a light touch, writer-director Ra'anan Alexandrowicz and his cast make it all very convincing. (At Kendall Square.)

Johnson Family Vacation ★★

More power to Cedric the Entertainer, who headlines his first comedy here. But this knock-off of National Lampoon's Vacation—this time about a black Los Angeles family struggling to make it to a Missouri family reunion—strains to generate laughs. The only sustained amusement comes in the two stretches when Cedric and his fellow Original Kings of Comedy vet Steve Harvey face off as two grown brothers who are still as competitive (and childish) as they were at 10. (Opens April 7 at Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

MC5: A True Testimonial ★★★½

David C. Thomas' long-in-the-works documentary about the pre-punk, politically outspoken Detroit band was worth the wait. There's a surprising amount of onstage footage of the band behind the still-powerful 1968 anthem "Kick Out the Jams," some of it FBI surveillance film. These clips confirm the band's reputation for living up to their most famous song. And the interviews with surviving members Michael Davis, Dennis Thompson and the priceless Wayne Kramer are never less than interesting, especially in their differing perspectives on the still-influential band's rise and fall. (At Coolidge Corner.)

NASCAR: The IMAX Experience ★½

Warner Bros. and NASCAR—the sports equivalent of the pop-up ad—have some nerve asking people to pay to see this self-serving promotional film. They've also got some nerve having the Kiefer Sutherland–read narration blatantly plug the Warner-affiliated company that sponsors the movie. Beyond that, this is just another clumsy, narration-dependent IMAX movie. (At the IMAX theaters at the New England Aquarium and at Jordan's in Natick.)

Never Die Alone ★½

DMX as a thug who talks about Buddhism and karma—and it's not a comedy. At least, not an intentional one. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Passion of the Christ ★½

What's more creepy—to watch one man beaten to a literal pulp for half of Mel Gibson's Jesus movie or to realize that the movie is more about Christ's scars than his teachings? It's a toss-up, but they're the sort of things that keep the movie from being genuinely dramatic (the cheesy slo-mo moments don't help, either). You have to admire Gibson as a producer for doing it his way—on his own nickel, in subtitled Aramaic and Latin. But as a director he gets little across except violence, right up to the money shot of blood squirting from Jesus' hands as they're nailed to the cross. Also, this is the Lord of the Rings/Harry Potter Bible movie: if you haven't read the book three times, it's not going to fill in any of the details for you. Consequently, most of the potentially "controversial" elements are too murky to change a general audience's views on anything, since the relationships between the Jews and the Romans and between Jesus and the Jewish leaders remain unclear. In fact, if you're just an average moviegoer who can't quote scripture but is just looking for a good story, this plodding ode to martyrdom was not made for you. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Spartan ★★★

It looks as if David Mamet has settled into making thrillers with interesting premises and credibility-challenging twists and turns. Partially filmed in Boston, this story about the abduction of the president's daughter has its occasional stumbling blocks, like the plot's dependence on several phone calls being made to a pay phone. (How many pay phones take incoming calls anymore?) But it holds up better than Mamet's last film, 2001's Heist, because of unorthodox touches like its intimate focus on the Secret Service and covert ops specialists working on getting the girl back. Val Kilmer plays one of these specialists, a self-described "worker bee" who's forced to think beyond military protocol once he realizes the cynical politics behind the situation. As with the pay phones, there are several leaps of faith you just have to take—jumps that you wouldn't make for a less interesting movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Starsky & Hutch ★★★

I never had any desire to see Starsky & Hutch on TV. But with Ben Stiller and Owen Wilson in the title roles and the action played intentionally for laughs, I was there. And I was rewarded. The two stars bring just the right daffy charm to the buddy-cops—one intense, the other laid-back—as the partners go after a smug cocaine kingpin (Vince Vaughn). You get Tab, muscle cars, afros, Jewfros, tube socks, disco, freedom rock, Rhoda head scarves and other 1970s cheese while S & H prowl the mean streets of Bay City with the help of Huggy Bear (Snoop Dogg). Think of The Brady Bunch Movie with guns. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The United States of Leland ★★

A tedious post–American Beauty mire of suburban misery, produced by and co-starring that movie's Kevin Spacey. This one is about an oddball teen (Ryan Gosling) who, for no apparent reason, kills the retarded brother of his ex-girlfriend (Jena Malone). Writer-director Matthew Ryan Hoge casts his net wide and offers a boatload of flawed characters—like Spacey in his "smug" mode as the killer's arrogant author dad—but he doesn't come back with much. It's hard to see what the point of it all is, besides getting a numb butt. The movie's mistake-ridden humanity, including Don Cheadle's juvie-hall teacher who is sympathetic toward the teen, simply doesn't coalesce. For what it's worth, most of the actors cast to play teens (Gosling, Chris Klein and Michelle Williams) are noticeably too old for their parts. (Opens April 9 at Harvard Square, Copley Place and Waltham Embassy.)

Dublin's Frames bring a magical element to the larger stage

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Only a few years ago, Irish rock fans couldn't buy a CD by the Frames—despite the fact that the decade-old band was among the country's most popular acts—simply because the group's earlier discs were out of print due to failed record deals.

Veteran Irish rock outfit the Frames are touring the States in support of their new CD, Set List.

At least, people couldn't buy the CDs in stores. "It became quite cultish to own a Frames record," singer-songwriter Glen Hansard recalls. "People were bidding on our records, and we didn't have any copies of them."

Things have changed. In 2003, the Frames unseated U2 as Best Group and Best Live Act in the annual readers poll of the Irish music paper Hot Press, while consolidating and expanding their legacy with a revelatory live disc called Set List.

"We put out Set List because we couldn't put out our old records, but we can put out these songs," Hansard says of the CD, which captures the Dublin band's emotive dynamics with a hometown club audience in late 2002. "It ended up being kind of a greatest-hits thing, which is weird, 'cause we've never had a hit in our career."

Now, after several under-the-radar visits to Boston, the Frames hit Avalon April 17, supporting upstart countryman Damien Rice, who launched his career as a solo singer-songwriter opening for the Frames in Ireland.

Hansard recalls, "He came to us and said, 'I'm a bit embarrassed saying this to you, but you've really helped me out and the States are going well for me. I'm not sure if you're gonna tell me to [get lost], but would you like to do this tour?' And we were, 'What are you saying? We'd love to do it!' For us, it's a great opportunity."

It doesn't hurt that Set List was just released in the U.S. on the Los Angeles label Anti, home to Tom Waits and Nick Cave. The Frames are also finishing a new studio album with Steve Albini, who once produced Nirvana and the Pixies—the latter a Hansard favorite along with influences Leonard Cohen and Bob Dylan.

"We were signed to a bunch of labels over here, and none of them ever did any work for us, but now we have an agent and label we really like," he says from a New Orleans stopover. "It's been a very long apprenticeship, but if success came to the Frames now, we've got shoulders for it."

Hansard and violinist Colm Mac Con Iomaire go back to the long-struggling group's beginnings, when they were called the Frames DC (for Dublin City) and had a female vocalist. "I could go out [on the street] and make money anytime with my guitar, and so could Colm, because he's a busker too," says Hansard, 33. "We were the only two members of the band I suppose who could go out and feed ourselves if we needed to, and we're the only two still in it."

In the Frames' early days, through a fluke audition, Hansard landed in the movie The Commitments, as that fictitious band's lead guitarist. But the role became Hansard's albatross in the press when the Frames released an album. "It was about how I was an actor-turned-musician," he recalls with disgust. "No clue." However, he recently saw an Irish TV ad touting a Commitments DVD "featuring Glen Hansard of the Frames." "For the first time," he laughs, "the Commitments need me to sell them!"

Of the Frames' Irish following, Hansard says, "We've always had a very strong audience. You know those bands that aren't popular and they're not in the newspapers, but for some reason, whenever they play a gig, a lot of people come? It was never a choice of ours to become that sort of band, but it built to a point where nobody could ignore it anymore."

"We're just a bunch of lads that play songs," Hansard adds of the Frames' unglamorous image. "The cult of personality is so rife in England, and in New York, where all the bands look great and have great haircuts. It's all about what you say rather than what you play. We've always rejected that."

The proof is onstage. "I don't think the Frames have anything to offer the world that hasn't been done," he says. "But when the elements are right, and you've got the band and the audience, a third element is invited in. That element is magic, and the only way I can describe it is that when it goes well, you see the poetry."

For the performances captured on Set List, the poetry ranged from symbiotic sing-alongs to a fire that broke out in Hansard's amp. "I just dropped the acoustic guitar and kept going," he recalls. "For me, the ultimate goal in life is to be able to be comfortable in my skin, grow old gracefully, and live in the moment." iB

I have two tickets for a prestigious black-tie dinner event in NYC at the Waldorf-Astoria. The event is coming up soon. I had everything all set weeks ago...meaning I had a new hot date to take to the dinner. I met him online and he lives in DC. So I hadn't met him in person. Big mistake! He cancelled. And I paid for two tickets at $250 per person. So I have an extra ticket but no date. You will have the fabulous opportunity to meet remarkable people such as: Sir Edmund Hillary, astronauts, Bob Ballard (he found the Titanic), etc... You will be seated next to a charming, attractive, 38-year-old woman, who is bright and cheerful, well-traveled, multilingual and a member of the club. In other words—me! Please send me your photo and a bio. You will gain extra points if you are familiar with the Explorers Club. You will gain many more if you are single, my age, handsome and have a zest for life! I look forward to meeting you.

Escalator Guy

You: going down the escalators at Copley one Monday morning at 10 am. You have dark hair, great eyes, are handsome and we made eye contact several times. Me: gray cashmere crew neck, jeans and the morning cup of joe. I came back to say hi but you were gone. I'd like to have the chance again. Hope to hear from you.
—CopleyTJ@yahoo.com

Oh Bloody Hell

I came across the Impersonals section only a few days ago, and truly, I believe it's a great way to share feelings with others. Yet, I was hesitant to write to you at the beginning, as I thought I might sound like a desperate guy. Oh well, maybe I am in a way, but it doesn't hurt to try.

I just moved to the Boston area a few months ago. It's really great to be here—I love the city and people can be very nice at times. I have had a chance to date a few promising young ladies. However, I have came across one thing they all have in common: fear of opening up! So, I thought about writing these few lines and sending them, through this page, to those who may read and appreciate them. I do not think I am so wrong by wanting to get to know some woman, who would not feel threatened by the fact that some man is interested in her and wants to truly and deeply know her. Is it too hard to open up to others? Is it freaking people out that much nowadays? Is it because people are so used to their worlds of isolation and seclusion that they do not want anybody to join them at all in the journey of life? And the search continues...until the right secure person is found.

Vandal

I don't know what you were doing behind my apartment building or how you figured out the combination. Why didn't you just steal the bike? It would have made more sense than tying the lock into intricate knots and looping it through the brake wires. That way neither of us could enjoy it. It was a good while before I was able to get wire cutters big enough to cut the lock off. And while it was sitting there you just couldn't resist doing more. Did you make a nice wad of cash from my tires? Did the rusted chain bring you happiness? What inspires a person to be so pointlessly destructive and mean? And if you don't mind my asking, what the hell could you possibly want with a white wicker basket that has neon plastic daisies on it?

Feb 27 at Abe & Louie's...

You were the most beautiful woman there that night.We struck up a conversation at the bar. You are so beautiful inside and out that I have not stopped thinking about you. We had the nicest conversation of all time. All I want is to have a cup of coffee somewhere quiet so we can talk more. Please drop me a note...even if you have to tell me to stop thinking about you. I'm a big boy, I can handle it (although it will be hard).

Tom G from Watertown!

I want to thank you for getting me home safely that fateful Saturday eve. Now that I have had time to reflect,I see that I was fortunate to have stumbled upon you in my crazy drunken state (as opposed to, say, Charles Manson). I thought I would have the opportunity to say how very sweet I think you are, but you didn't call! I don't blame you for wanting to steer clear of a chick who walks up to you at the Bell and Hand and asks you for a kiss before even saying hello. Nonetheless, I would love to hear from you, but more importantly—thanks.

Personality

Yes, I found the Gap at Quincy Market that blustery evening in February. What I didn't find was the bravado to ask you out! Thanks anyway for giving me directions...wrong directions, so that I would have to walk back to the 24-hour copy shop to ask you for help again. You know, if you contact me, maybe we could go to the Gap during business hours and peruse mock turtlenecks or something.

Whiskey's Knight

You saved me one night not too long ago at Whiskey's. I was surrounded by some sketchy guys I was not interested in talking to and you came up to me and started talking to me like we were from the same high school and hadn't seen each other in awhile. We talked for the rest of the night even though you are a Yankees fan! You asked the bartender for two prairie fire shots, which they didn't serve, and then he cut you off for even asking. You live in Brighton near where I used to. You had to get up early and go to a Providence basketball game the next morning. You asked for my number and never called, I wish I had asked for yours. If you still have my number, it's not too late to call.

To the Not-So-Kindhearted Soul Who Found My Wallet...

Well, I suppose that I should start with a thank you for being so kind as to return my wallet after you found it on the Amtrak train in South Station coming to Boston from New York. Or perhaps I should thank you for not taking everything in my wallet, just what you found of interest. While I am grateful that you didn't take everything in my wallet, I'm appalled at how people treat other people's things these days. Was it really worth it to take the little money I had and my T pass? Did you ever stop to think that the little money I had was what I had left from the weekend spring break I was able to take, because I had to return on Tuesday to work all week. I pass up nights of partying to baby-sit and make extra money to support myself. You know, I really thought people were better than this but I guess I was wrong. Serves me right for coming to the city from the Midwest and expecting people to treat others how they want to be treated. It's the golden rule, and somehow you've made the gold tarnish. My faith in people has been ruined, so thank you.

rockie horoscope

ARIES MARCH 20–APRIL 19

No gentle, lamb-like exit for March this year. The month ends on an aggressive note with Rams challenging roaring Lions, territorial Goats and passive-aggressive Crabs. Then, after facing whatever or whoever is making you feel anxious, you'll be poised to leap at the first potentially profitable project you're offered. This should occur around the full moon, when your Mars ruler and expansive, enthusiastic Jupiter present a plan that'll appeal to your risk-taking nature. Or you meet someone who serves the same purpose.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

While your attractive and affable Venus ruler transits your sign, make the most of being the belle of the ball. As of April 3, the pretty part of this party is over, and what you'll be left to work with is a practical mind-set, reliable intelligence and a clever mouth. Insightful Mercury enters Taurus on March 31 for a long, strange trip: the planet of communication, travel and sales turns retrograde on April 6, backpedals into Aries on the 12th, goes direct on the 30th, reenters Taurus on May 15 and finally leaves on June 5.

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

This is a tense time, when your nerves can shatter as easily as glass. While gigantic, optimistic Jupiter sweet-talks your Mercury ruler into an uncomfortable relationship, you'll tend to overlook details, overestimate results and wind up compensating like mad. But what might really throw you is how feisty Mars in your sign can trigger a startling reaction when confronted by rebellious Uranus in your midheaven. Hope that once Venus enters Gemini on the 3rd, you'll revert to your sweet, amiable self again. Or not.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Trials and tribulations are probably old hat to you by now. Although you'll never be another Sisyphus, Hercules or Job, you're becoming quite proficient at solving problems created by having Saturn in your sign. Once you put the latest responsibility to rest, try to take a break. Otherwise, trying to fix a buddy's dilemma could cost you money. Because Mercury in your career domain is turning retrograde on the 6th for three weeks, be sure to contact clients, close deals, etc. well before then.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

You're in a situation similar to the Moon Child's, with a friend who is headed for trouble and looking to you to bail him or her out. Don't act on impulse, wait for a mutual ally's assistance around the full moon. The entire episode should be resolved by Easter. Mercury will be retrograde in your house of travel and study from April 6–30, a good time to consider (not confirm) vacation destinations, conferences you'd like to attend and how to celebrate your birthday. Come August 9, Mercury will turn retrograde again.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

An unexpected and fairly disruptive situation at work can energize a partnership arrangement, but like everybody else, you're advised to take things somewhat slowly. Don't leap at the first offer, don't fly off the handle. Life gets a bit more complicated this week with more people joining your scene, adding their two cents' worth. Meanwhile, you should be preparing for your Mercury ruler's backflip on the 6th. While you're still able to think clearly, file your taxes. Later, during retrograde, you can rewrite the Great American Screenplay.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Don't let a frustrating situation bring you down. Sliding into a dismal depression now that spring has arrived is so un-Libra-like. However, if opposition from the Aries sun has been blocking your efforts to move forward, the Libra full moon on the 5th could well be a turning point. Get all your ducks in a row, the papers you need signed ASAP, because on the 6th Mercury turns retrograde for three weeks of "nothin' doin'." Not that you'll be any the less vocal; your Venus ruler enters expressive Gemini on the 3rd.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Only one more temper tantrum to endure and you're pretty much done for the season. If possible, try to curb the ranting and raving going on while your insistent Mars co-ruler challenges rebellious Uranus. And be careful if an appliance shuts down or a pipe bursts during the "out of the ordinary" atmosphere on April Fools' Day. Mercury's flip takes place in your marriage house, so don't expect much progress with partnership matters, just more time (and reasons) to reconsider deals you've made and those coming up.

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

You might not feel the full thrust of Martian aggressiveness until the Red Planet challenges your Jupiter ruler on the 5th, but someone in the family or your landlord could catch hell and dish it out when Mars hassles with ornery Uranus that weekend. Changes, some sudden, some premeditated, are about to happen. If you're making travel plans, do so before Mercury goes retrograde on the 6th and gremlins invade your computer, misinform you about connections, etc. Easter, however, should be glorious, no matter where you are.

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

If you're into extreme sports, even marginally dangerous ones, be very careful. Athletic Mars in your house of recreation and risk is in a precarious relationship to "I didn't see it coming" Uranus. Given the fact that you might not be at your most resilient while the sun is sapping strength from your Saturn ruler, it makes sense to avoid anything that connotes recklessness. Pursuing a romantic relationship with a confirmed nonconformist can also lead to a different sort of disaster. Be safe, not sorry.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

Strict parental decisions or institutions withholding funds are mere slaps on the wrist compared with what can befall you when hot-tempered Mars attacks your independent-minded Uranus ruler. This is when accidents and earthquakes tend to happen. Try to remain invisible this week and hope that a serene, spiritual vibe will prevail for Palm Sunday and Passover. Cars and bikes better go into the shop before Mercury turns retrograde in, of all places, your house of commuting. Upgrade telecommunication devices too.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

Why Mercury turning retrograde affects Pisces so strongly is a mystery. The little guy isn't your ruling planet, and this time, it's not in a sign that frequently gives you grief. Nevertheless, prepare for its flip on the 6th, because it takes place in your house of money and other assets. Clear the fog from your head, pretty as it may be, put your wish list away for a while and concentrate on taking care of financial business. Also, be careful working around the house, especially with sharp objects and fire.

UNLIKE THE REST OF YOUR FRIENDS, WE WANT TO SEE THE PHOTOS FROM YOUR NEXT TRIP

Where do you take us? Send us a picture of you or a friend, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed Improper Sightings.

Marilyn Deinhammer, Brian Helfrich and Jacquelyn Helfrich catch some rays in Naples, Fla. Brian certainly doesn't need to ask which way the gym is.

Philbert Chin tipped a few pints at the Australian Grand Prix in Melbourne. We love how Aussies get to the point: Piece together what the sign says behind the magazine.

Jacqueline Church and Caleb Noël Ho visited Antarctica, where a penguin asked where they were from. When they said Boston, he replied, "I hear the weather there sucks!"

Susan Reigel explored the old Japanese jail in Saipan. The jail was closed after a rash of chopstick shankings in the '30s.

Lindsey Hoffman brought the Improper's Music Issue, appropriately enough, to the Song and Dance Festival in Vilnius, Lithuania. We're assuming these ladies are performers in the festival and not flight attendants on Air Lithuania.

New Mexico governor Bill Richardson finds out what a nice little hacienda in the Back Bay goes for with the Real Estate issue.

Our goal is raise $1,000,000 by December 2004.

Thank you for your support and helping us make a difference.

LESLIE'S LINKS was founded in 1999 by Leslie Semonian who battled cancer and passed away in December of 1999 at the age of 32. During the eight and a half year period of her illness, until her death, Leslie never allowed cancer to stand in the way of her goal of helping others. She knew how precious life was and energetically embraced each day. She helped others to appreciate their own lives more. She wanted to be remembered as a participant in life, not an observer. Her passion was boundless, and will continue in the hearts of the many friends and people whom she inspired.

Leslie's Links is a fund at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute which raises money for Ewings Sarcoma Cancer Research in various ways. One of which is through the Leslie's Links bike team associated with the 192-mile Pan-Mass Challenge bike-a-thon from Sturbridge to Provincetown. Leslie's Links has raised over $700,000 since inception in 1999.

LAST SCENE HERE

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

At the BPL's Litro Inferno, clockwise from top: Lisa Hughes and Dennis Lehane; John Spooner and Andre Dubus III; the Cat in the Hat; Art Buchwald

FAHRENHEIT 451...

"Out with the old, in with the new," was the theme of Litro Inferno—the Boston Public Library's annual black-tie book-burning in Copley Square. To make room for new acquisitions while purging the library's shelves of the perverse and subversive, guests gathered beneath a giant yellow and white striped tent to drink champagne, dine on pork tenderloin and toast marshmallows for s'mores over the open flames.

The event attracted such high-wattage glitterati as two-time Super Bowl mack daddy Bob Kraft and his wife, Myra; their son Jonathan, and his wife, Patti; finance writer and stockbroker to the stars John Spooner; best-selling novelists and stud muffins Andre Dubus III and Dennis Lehane; octogenarian humorist Art Buchwald; effervescent do-gooders Stephanie Warburg and Ann Gund; Boston City Councilor Mike Ross; Back Bay philanthropists Miguel and Suki de Braganza; and a guy in a Cat in the Hat outfit who begged guests to perform the Heimlich maneuver on him and then repaid the favor by coughing up a hair ball.

During the live auction, guests bid on books like The Origin of Species and Are You There God? It's Me, Margaret, which they then doused with lighter fluid and tossed on the fire.

"This is so much fun," said one committee member who recently moved here from Rhea County, Tenn. "I even brought my old copy of the Constitution, since they're working on a new one."

WHEN CINDERELLA HITS MIDDLE AGE...

Apropos of an evening designed to remind guests of the days before their lives were ruined by marriage and children, Young Friends of the Newly Suburban held a toga party in the ballroom of the Ritz to raise money for former downtown residents who have been forced to relocate to area codes 508, 781, 978, etc.

The bacchanalian gathering included heavy hors d'oeuvres, heavy drinking and a general amnesty for anyone caught hitting on someone other than his or her spouse. During the cocktail hour, a plastic surgeon administered Botox injections, while Queer Eye for the Straight Guy impersonators offered unsolicited makeover tips to unsuspecting guests.

Spotted amid all the prefacelift socialites and philanthropic types: South End trendsetter Molly Dunne and her husband, Stephens; Nashville-bred arts patron Trevania Henderson with her husband, the dashing John; big-hearted Beacon Hillions Kevin and Karyn Lamb; mutual fund heiresses Beth and Abby Johnson; TV producers Lisa Pierpont and Jennifer Donaldson Janes with their respective other halves, Alex and Tom; banking scion Charlie Gifford and the stunning Betsy; Back Bay party pair Rachael and Andy Goldfarb; the unfairly photogenic Beth Dickerson and David Drubner; party animals Mike and Betsy Danziger; Channel 5 glamazon Liz Brunner (who arm-wrestled her date to see who would keep the one-per-couple goodie bag); and a pair of Junior Leaguers who argued about the relative merits of yoga vs. Pilates before actually coming to blows over whether or not South Natick is technically a part of Dover or Wellesley.

Following dessert and coffee, there was 15 minutes of dancing before the raffle prize was drawn and a lucky couple from Brookline won a Back Bay resident parking sticker, but by 11 o' clock, the room had cleared out, with everyone offering some version of the age-old lament: "The baby-sitter has to be home by midnight."

Liz Brunner arm-wrestles her date.

FIREARMS ARE SO BUTCH...

They say politics makes for strange bedfellows, which was certainly the case when the Log Cabin Republicans and the National Rifle Association co-hosted a gala performance of Annie Get Your Gun at the Wang Center to raise money for Gay Shotgun Weddings.

The evening began with a preperformance cocktail reception, where the high-octane crowd included Governor Mitt Romney and wife Ann (who chuckled when someone suggested that perhaps gay Mormons should be allowed to have more than one spouse); celebrity guests Michael J. Fox and Tracy Pollan; Dorchester homie Donnie Wahlberg; South Shore Oscar winner Chris Cooper and his wife, Marianne Leone Cooper; the American Repertory Theatre's boy wonder, Gideon Lester; Commonwealth Shakespeare Company head honcho Steven Maler; Clear Channel grand poobah Tony McLean; Huntington Theatre head Nicky Martin; and New Hampshire's openly gay Episcopal bishop, Gene V. Robinson, who summed the evening up by saying, "If gay people have the right to get married, they should also have the right to be forced into marriage at gunpoint."

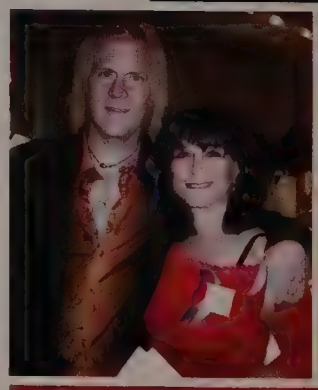
As entertaining as the performance was, the funniest moment came in the lobby during intermission, when a live auction was hosted by comedian, gun enthusiast and star of the gay-themed NBC sitcom It's All Relative, Lenny Clarke.

Responding to a heckler in the crowd, he turned to Wang Center head Josiah Spaulding Jr. and said, "Hey Joe, you might not have the Nutcracker here anymore, but you've still got plenty of ball-breakers."

At the Gay Shotgun Weddings benefit, clockwise from top left: Neal McDonough; Tracy Pollan and Michael J. Fox; Mitt and Ann Romney; Donnie Wahlberg deals the cards; Jennifer and Lenny Clarke

PUN HOPEFULLY NOT INTENDED...

The Whitney Museum in New York has one. So does Venice. So why shouldn't Boston?



That seemed to be the rationale behind the Children's Museum's first International Fingerpainting Biennial—a juried art exhibit, to be held every two years, in which countries are invited to submit the work of their most precocious and gifted 3- to 5-year-olds.

Seen sipping white wine and nibbling animal crackers at the Opening Night VIP reception were Talbots CEO Arnold Zetcher and his fashion-plate wife, Ellen; Aerosmith bassist Tom Hamilton with the stunning Terry; glamorina Nina Fialkow and her other half, David; Chestnut Hill socialites Debbie Lewis and Vicky Whitney; Red Sox slugger Manny Ramirez and the gorgeous Julianna; Channel 4 anchor babe Lisa Hughes; yoga goddess Sara Isenberg; celebrity chef Ming Tsai; and the terrifying twosome of Leigh Weatherly and Glynis Hobika.

In keeping with the tradition of art sparking controversy, there was an entry by a 4-year-old Korean girl, entitled Why Is Michael Jackson in Jail? To which one guest responded with the unfortunate choice of words: "That's one to handle with kid gloves."

Oh, and by the way...April Fools. iB

BEAUTY FULL

In Boston, where the official arrival of spring (March 20, brrrr) is such a tease, it's usually more practical to greet the season with a stylish new haircut or brighter shade of lipstick than with a sundress or sandals. For our annual Beauty Issue, fashion and beauty editor Samantha House enlisted the help of some of the city's talented hairstylists and makeup artists to show you the looks—from ultra-bright lips to classic updos—that are hot this spring (page 20).

Guys, we haven't forgotten you, nor have we given up on convincing you to add a few more steps to your grooming ritual (page 34). In this issue, we also give a few men the chance to sound off on women's beauty routines—what they like and don't like in hairstyles, makeup and other skin-deep topics (page 26).

Finally, we're proud to welcome a new columnist to the IMPROPER's fold. Fresh from the Sox' opening game in Baltimore, NECN sportscaster and Peabody native Chris Collins kicks off The Collins Card (page 16) with his take on the upcoming Red Sox season. Is this team headed for glory or heartbreak? Collins weighs in. We look forward to bringing you his unique view on the sacred topic of Boston sports in every issue.

ALOHA, MON

Paul Sherman should keep his critiques of films to the actual quality of the film and not use them as a vehicle to protect the "darker people" of the world, as he does in his review of 50 First Dates (March 31). Anyone who's ever been to Hawaii, or even done a bit of research, knows that "Jawaiian" music—reggae music blended with Pacific music—is very popular there. I was out there in November, and there are only 10 or so radio stations, and half of them really do play this reggae/Pacific Jawaiian music.

AWW, SHUCKS

The review of B&G Oysters ("Shellfish Desires," March 31) was by far the best restaurant review I have ever read in Boston. I always find that, compared with food writers like Mimi Sheraton or Ruth Reichl, Boston reviewers sound like country hicks. Charles Mokriski did a splendid job of describing the atmosphere, food and wine at this charming place, and Berta Daniels' photographs were excellent. Keep up the good, varied and original writing.

WHO'S THAT GIRL?

I was a little bit concerned about the photo of Mitt Romney and his "wife," Ann, on page 116 of the Boston's Beloved Bartenders issue (March 31). Ann appears to be 15, and it looks as though she has just hit puberty. Could it be a mistake? I think so!

—JULIE PERRY

Editor's Note: For Julie and others who may not have read the text that accompanied the photo in question, that was not Ann Romney, but neither was the picture taken at the Gay Shotgun Weddings benefit—that was the annual April Fools edition of Last Scene Here.

SOUTHERN MAINE MAN

I loved your recent interview with Tony Shalhoub (March 31). But you cited Tony as a graduate of the University of Maine; he is actually an alumnus of the University of Southern Maine, in Portland. I am also an alum, and Tony is our most famous graduate. He made a special trip back to campus last year to teach some acting workshops. It's great to see his career continue to flourish.

RESURRECTION

Scollay Square's decor and drink selections pay homage to the historic neighborhood.

Ahi tuna Napolean with ginger-lime vinaigrette and wonton crisps

Those familiar with the legacy of long-departed Scollay Square will be surprised to see its new, nostalgic namesake restaurant in Beacon Hill. In its heyday, Scollay Square (the area now Government Center) was a seedy nightlife mecca, filled with tattoo parlors, gritty bars and theaters presenting burlesque and vaudeville acts. But the sleek restaurant, which draws a well-heeled Beacon Hill crowd, manages to pay homage to the bygone era without being overly kitschy. It's got plenty of memorabilia scattered throughout, though. A big bright replica of an old Scollay Square sign hangs on the wall near the entrance, and giant black-and-white photographs of the square and its icons adorn the walls.

Co-owners and longtime friends Brad Dalbeck and Chris Damian (who is also the chef) opened the restaurant in February, after coming upon local author David Kruh's book, Always Something Doing: Boston's Infamous Scollay Square. They fell in love with the idea of resurrecting some of the square's history and found the right spot in the former digs of the Black Goose. "Scollay Square was all about fun and friends," Dalbeck says. "It was a perfect fit for us."

Diners eat at candlelit tables next to an open kitchen or at a secluded bar in back. The menu of upscale comfort food—from the delicious (and ungreasy) herb-seasoned chicken tenderloins ($7) to seared sea scallops with crab risotto cake ($19) and grilled sirloin ($22)—runs the gamut, reflecting Damian's years of experience with different types of cuisine. There's the portabella quesadilla appetizer ($8), inspired by his stint as chef at Harvard Square's Border Café; and the menu's Asian flair—ahi tuna Napolean with ginger-lime vinaigrette and wonton crisps ($9)—comes from his tenure at P. F. Chang's. The variety is designed to eliminate what Damian calls the "veto vote"—that picky eater in a group who doesn't go to a restaurant "because they hate Chinese, are a vegetarian or only eat seafood."

As you listen to the mellow, big band–style music and linger over one of the decadent desserts (a must is the white chocolate bread pudding), get into the Scollay Square spirit and camp it up a bit. Try a Cranberry Tassel Spinner cocktail, named for burlesque star Sally Keith, a.k.a. "Queen of the Tassles," who was famous for her unusual spinning abilities. 21 Beacon St., Boston (617-742-4900). www.scollaysquare.com. —E.H.

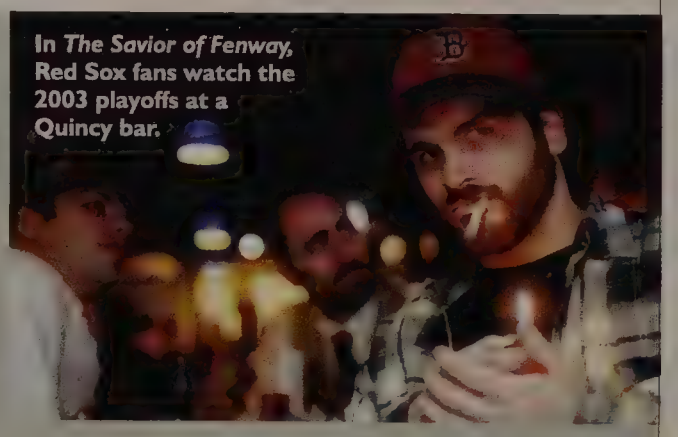
GYM-FREE WAYS TO GET IN SHAPE



It's marathon time again. Watching thousands of people run 26.2 miles while you're on the sidelines (and likely drunk) is enough to make anyone feel inert. If you want to go the distance athletically but aren't up for the mileage of a marathon, there are plenty of activity options available locally. Here's a sampling.

- Pedal-push with the Boston Bicycle Club, which offers group rides and races for all levels. $30 a year. www.bostonbicycleclub.org.
- Get the thrill of rock climbing without traveling to the mountains, at the Boston Rock Gym. It's $55 for an introductory lesson and equipment rental. 78G Olympia Ave., Woburn (781-935-7325). www.bostonrockgym.com.
- If you're ready to take it outside, gear up at REI. Beginners' climbing packages including equipment like carabiners, harness and chalk bags start at $86. Landmark Center, 401 Park Drive, Boston (617-236-0746).
- Sailing season opened April 1. Get out on the water with Community Boating. You don't need to own a boat: The $175 annual fee includes introductory sailing lessons and access to boats. Charles River Esplanade between the Hatch Shell and the Longfellow Bridge (617-523-1038). www.community-boating.org.
- Rollerblading anyone? For organized group skates and connections to skating instructors, get on track with the Inline Club of Boston, and you'll be flying down the Esplanade in no time. $20 per year. (781-932-5457). www.sk8net.com

SOX IN THE ARTS

In The Savior of Fenway, Red Sox fans watch the 2003 playoffs at a Quincy bar.

One measure of Red Sox mania round these parts is the team's influence on culture, and lately they've been the subject of much ink beyond the sports pages. For instance, on April 17, Harvey and Frederick Frommer host a signing of their new book, Red Sox vs. Yankees, The Great Rivalry, at Great Bay Restaurant. Former Sox pitcher turned cigar slinger Luis Tiant is on hand too, to help bring the Sox/Yanks beef to life. Also on the literary tip, Scribner publishing has announced that Stewart O'Nan and Stephen King will be coauthoring a book chronicling the Red Sox' 2004 season, and of course Scribner is hoping the hometown boys don't disappoint come fall (or, if they do disappoint, that they do it in typically dramatic fashion). The book doesn't have a title yet—maybe they should hold an open call for names, like Sox brass did for the documentary of the 2003 season, Still, We Believe: The Red Sox Movie. We're voting for The Girl Who Loved Pokey Reese. Finally, playwright Brendon Bates won a New York International Fringe Festival Excellence in Playwrighting Award for his latest play, The Savior of Fenway. Set in a bar in Quincy during the final two Red Sox–Yankees playoff games of 2003, the play opens May 5 at the Cambridge Family YMCA Center and runs till May 30. If all this artistic activity is inspired by the agony of defeat (and it is), we'll be interested to see what happens if...you know. —Ezra Dyer

STYLIN'

Winthrop-based computer bag manufacturer Tekstyl wants you to bag your old laptop tote and slide your computer into one of its "hybrid" covers. Tekstyl's bags wrap around your laptop, so you can open it up and log on without removing the bag, thus protecting your machine from the bumps and scrapes of life on the road. The company has been around for about a year and recently added a few custom patterns (Hawaiian, anyone?) to its line. Solid-color bags start at $65 and are available at www.tekstyl.com.

tasty tidbits

A BIT CORNY

Corn to Be Wild... Corn—used in such commonplace items as beer, disposable diapers and cheese spread—has a new, environmentally friendly use. Natural foods retailer Wild Oats Natural Marketplace has recently introduced biodegradable food containers made out of corn. Although they're most definitely inedible, they are good for packaging all your cold deli items, from fruit to pasta salad. We've been warned, however, not to pop these babies in the microwave—high temperatures cause the containers to disintegrate. 2151 Mystic Valley Parkway, Medford (781-395-4998). www.wildoats.com.

Icing on the Cake... We knew it was only a matter of time before some kind of hall of fame came calling on Todd English. The prestigious James Beard Foundation recently announced its plans to welcome the celebrity restaurateur into its HOF for foodies, the Who's Who of Food and Beverage, in a May 10 ceremony at the New York Marriott Marquis. English's empire of Italian kitchens (Olives, Figs, Bonfire) lands him among the ranks of Who's Who inductees like Alain Ducasse, Jeffrey Steingarten and Nobuyuki "Nobu" Matsuhisa. Not bad company. In other English news, The Todd has created a special artichoke heart pizza that is available at Figs restaurants until May 15 (the date of the Avon Walk for Breast Cancer). Proceeds from the pie benefit Men with Heart, a group of philanthropic fellows who raise money to fight breast cancer.

Top: Free compost from Starbucks. Bottom: Wild Oats' eco-friendly corn containers.

Green Beans... In honor of the upcoming International Compost Awareness Week (May 2-8) we thought it appropriate to alert the public to a little-known fact: Used coffee grounds are great for your garden, and they're available daily at Starbucks—for free. The coffee conglomerate began the Grounds for Your Garden program nine years ago after it commissioned a study that determined that coffee grounds' high nitrogen content make it a good composting agent. Happily, the giveaways are a great way for Starbucks to get rid of its yucky used coffee. Spent grounds are available in recycled packaging at all 'bucks locations on a first-come-first-serve basis. www.starbucks.com.

Chew on This... Remember Jolt, the old-school energy drink with "all the sugar and twice the caffeine"? Well, it's staging a comeback, and this time it's chewable. Jolt Caffeine-Energy Gum is the brainchild of the amped-up cola lords and their chewy counterparts at GumRunners LLC. Packed with guarana, ginseng and caffeine (about half a cup of coffee's worth per piece), the spearmint and icy mint flavors hit shelves two months ago and are causing a "buzz" on local college campuses. According to GumRunners co-founder Kevin Gass, "Within five minutes, [the caffeine] is in your blood, as opposed to coffee that has to snake though your digestive tract." So, why is Boston the ideal market for caffeinated gum? Gass gives three simple reasons: "the students, the tech population and Boston's a fun, nightlife kind of town."

CURL POWER

Since curly hair is en vogue right now and the trend seems to have staying power, I decided to put a new product to the test to see if it delivered the smooth, springy look everyone is after. Curl Friends, the new line by Milanese curl guru Antonio Soddu, is specifically formulated for girls with curls and includes 11 products that promise to calm frizz without any fuss. I volunteered a few co-workers to act as guinea pigs, and the results were visible within days. Soft, well-defined curls replaced frizz and flyaways, and the S.O.S. Extreme Conditioner and the Humidity Blocker Leave-in Conditioner were standouts. The hair care line is available at select salons and at www.curlfriends.com, where you can also find styling tips and a free package of sample size products ($8.95 for shipping).

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

Drollery and Democrats... Quick with a quip? Got a head for politics? The Comedy Connection hosts two events this spring for those would-be comedy stars. Improv troupe Chicago City Limits and Bass Ale want you to bring your best gibes to their upcoming Boston auditions (April 15, 22 and 29; call 781-662-0725 for locations) for a chance to win up to $1,000. The winner will be announced at the Reach for Greatness Bass Red Triangle Comedy Tour show May 26 at the Comedy Connection. If you lack verbal comedy chops but have a face like a donkey, the Comedy Connection is holding auditions May 16 for Democrat doppelgangers to participate in a series of Democratic National Convention shows. (617-248-9700).

The Look for Less... If cheap chic is your style, you're probably already a fan of Second Time Around, the clothing consignors specializing in "previously loved" designer duds. Now, the vintage vendors have expanded into the realm of furniture. Their new Harvard Square store offers "gently used," high-end sofas, bed sets, coffee tables and other home goods. They plan to carry name brands like Ethan Allen, Crate and Barrel and Adesso, as well as a few antiques—at about a third to a quarter of the retail price. As always, the shop is looking for new wares. But only those with designer label furnishings less than five years old need apply. One Brattle Square, Cambridge (617-266-7446). www.secondtimearound.net.

Second Skins... We can't imagine how good a pair of $60 pantyhose must look. The chichi panty mavens at Wolford Boutique set up shop in Copley Place April 15, and for their customers, price is no object. Known for its luxe hosiery (control-top sheers go for $55) and other fancy undergarments, the shop also sells gear like bodysuits and camisoles, designed by Vivienne Westwood and Karl Lagerfeld, ranging from $300 to $800. If that's out of your budget, you can always hit up the new Victoria's Secret at the other end of the mall (opening in May), where sheer control-tops cost about $8.50.

Gems on the Hill... Charles Street is becoming a leading contender in the accessories and trinkets market. The Ruby Door is the latest such vendor to move into Beacon Hill's shopping promenade—it opened on March 31. Owner/jewelry designer Tracey Weiss took over the space formerly occupied by the Beauty Mark (which moved down the street) to showcase her jewelry, as well as handbags, belts and other accessories. The necklaces, bracelets and earrings range from bulky and bright, like a lemon citrine choker for $850, to dainty and delicate, like iolite and blue chalcedony earrings for $95. 92B Pinckney St., Boston (617-720-2001). www.therubydoor.com.

Bags at 1154 Lill Studio

Bag Ladies... With handbag designer emerging as the choice second career of the moment (Gwen Stefani, Nicky Hilton, Monica Lewinsky), we weren't surprised to find two new handbag specialty shops with virtually the same concept: Anna William opened in Porter Square March 20, and 1154 Lill Studio set up March 26 on Newbury Street. Their common schtick? Customizing. Both allow shoppers to mix and match styles and fabrics to create their own one-of-a-kind bag or buy one ready made. Anna William offers more than 150 fabrics in about 18 styles, while Lill has more than 20 bags available in hundreds of fabrics. At both places, friends can book a private handbag party where they can bring their own food and make some bags. Anna William, *2014 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-547-2662), www.annawilliam.com. The Joshua Frase Foundation hosted the 7th Annual Muscle Dream Team Gala April 1 at the Boston Harbor Hotel. More than 400 party-goers gathered to help 11-year NFL veteran Paul Frase and his wife, Alison, in their mission to find a cure for their son's neuromuscular disorder. The Frase family created the JFF in 1995 when their son, Joshua, was diagnosed with myotubular myopathy. Over the last six years, the JFF Muscle Dream Team has raised almost $2.5 million toward the fight against this illness.

ELMER'S GLUED

Tony Soprano is under less surveillance than I am

It's been a while since I've updated you on the exploits of my next-door neighbor, Elmer, so here's a quick refresher: Elmer looks like Grandpa Simpson, has lived in my building for at least 15 years, and for some tenuous building-management reason has keys to my apartment.

Elmer needs to get out more. Actually, if he got out at all, that would be more. I'm confident that if the government sent him to live with Pakistani tribesmen for a few months, he'd find Osama bin Laden just by barging into people's tents and claiming he had to inspect their furnaces. Since I live in a "garden level" apartment, the furnaces for the building are behind one of my walls, and recent weeks have seen Elmer in my apartment three times with important furnace-related business. He's also been in once to do something with the gas meters, and I recently returned from a trip to find that my bed had been moved to allow access to some type of drain in the floor. I'm waiting for Elmer to reveal that he's also a T mechanic and there's a train in my closet that needs maintenance, if he could just get in there for a second.

The maintenance-related visits are legit, as far as I know. But the fact that Elmer tirelessly monitors everything that happens on the ground floor is starting to get to me. For instance, a couple of months ago I let my laundry sit in the dryer for about a half hour after it was done. When I scooped my clothes out and went to clean the lint trap—leaving a dirty lint trap is a cardinal sin with Elmer—I discovered that it had already been cleaned. So in the half hour since the dryer stopped, Elmer had visited the laundry room and cleaned the lint screen. I suppose this was meant as a friendly gesture, but I found it highly unsettling that Elmer pays so much attention to my laundry. At least I've avoided the situation Roommate Scott found himself in while doing laundry recently, when Elmer made him come into his apartment and learn about all his medications. From what I understand, this wasn't Scott's idea of a good time.

Another night, Elmer came storming out of his apartment at 11:30 when I walked into the hallway from outside. No doubt he was hoping he'd catch the perpetrator of some post–10 pm drying. He was obviously unprepared to see me and made a poor transition out of confrontational mode, blurting, "So, you're home late!" I didn't know how to respond to that, but "And you're being a nosy maniac late!" would have been appropriate.

The next example of the omnipresence of Elmer came when something died in the ceiling and stunk up my apartment. The odor was stifling, but the prospect of discovering the source of the smell was worse. If I poked up a ceiling panel and a decomposing rat fell out on my head, I might run through the wall like the Kool-Aid man and not stop until I reached McLean Hospital for a lobotomy.

I took a "let's wait this thing out, it can't decompose forever" strategy and began airing out the apartment by cracking the door to the small courtyard we share with Elmer. Since it was cold out, I never left the door open for very long. But one night I absentmindedly left it wide open while I was out for a few hours. When I returned, the door was closed. Did Elmer close it, and if so, how did he know it was open in the first place? He could've closed it from outside, but why would he be outside in the cold when there's nothing on his side of the courtyard but gravel? Is it possible the wind somehow sucked it closed? I can't be sure, and this uncertainty is spreading to other aspects of my life—are we going through toilet paper inordinately fast, or is that my imagination? I also had a dream the other night that it was I, not Scott, who got the medication tour and it took me quite a while to get back to sleep after my Nightmare on Elmer Street. Elmer moves with ninja silence in his fuzzy slippers, and he's all up in my head.

IF ELMER WERE SENT TO LIVE WITH PAKISTANI TRIBESMEN, HE'D FIND BIN LADEN JUST BY BARGING INTO PEOPLE'S TENTS TO INSPECT THEIR FURNACES

Ultimately, Elmer is harmless. But my personal paparazzo definitely needs another outlet for his considerable time and energy—the other day he called the building manager about a rattling hot-water pipe in my kitchen sink. I'm probably the only guy in Boston praying for a Wal-Mart to go up next to his apartment. Elmer would make one hell of a greeter, and I'm pretty sure their hardware department carries locks. IB

JOAN RIVERS

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Entertainer, fashion plate and truth-teller Joan Rivers was born and raised in New York, the daughter of Russian immigrants. She came to national prominence in 1965, with an appearance on the Tonight Show, and was eventually named Johnny Carson's permanent guest host. Her list of accomplishments includes writing eight books, appearances in eight feature films and countless television shows, a nationally syndicated radio program, three Broadway plays and stints as a syndicated newspaper and magazine columnist. She also developed a successful line of jewelry and skin care products for QVC, and she maintains a grueling schedule of lectures and public appearances. Among her numerous awards and accolades are a Tony nomination, an Emmy and a star on the Hollywood Walk of Fame. She is the mother of Melissa, with whom she co-hosts E!'s fashion revues, and doting grandmother to 3-year-old Cooper Endicott. From April 29–May 1, Rivers brings her one-woman show, Joan Rivers Broke and Alone, to the Wilbur Theatre.

Jonathan Soroff: We're so excited you're coming to Boston.

Joan Rivers: Well, I'm so excited to come, partly because I'm gonna give back some of the pictures I stole from the Gardner Museum. Not all. Some.

JS: [Laughs.] Oh? Which ones?

JR: The Rembrandt I like, but the Vermeer you can have back. I got it home and it just didn't work.

JS: It clashed with the drapes? So how often do reporters start by saying, "Can we talk?" And how annoying is that?

JR: About every other one, but it's not annoying, because it means it's entered the vocabulary. Anyway, that was years ago. I don't even use it now. I think these days what I say a lot is, "Am I wrong?"

JS: What about "Who are you wearing?" which was actually my next question?

JR: Oh, you're gonna be very sorry you asked. Right now, I'm wearing Manolo Blahnik sling-back orange shoes, a Christian Dior denim jacket and Kmart jeans.

JS: So where do you shop, or do designers just give you stuff?

JR: No. That's a myth. They lend you stuff and they pull it off your back like Cinderella. I have a wonderful man who finds things for me based on what I need. He's a genius. I don't have time to shop. Besides, every time you do go into a department store, they think, "Oh, here comes a rich celebrity," and they pull out the most expensive stuff, and then you feel terrible if it doesn't look good.

JS: So what qualifies you to pass judgment on the way other people look?

MY ACCOUNTANT SAID TO ME, "I'VE GOTTA ADMIT, YOU'VE HAD A GREAT LIFE." I DON'T REGRET ONE PAIR OF MANOLO BLAHNIKS OR ONE ANTIQUE I EVER BOUGHT.

JR: Unlike, say, Steven Cojocaru, or any of the others? [Laughs.] When I look back, I've always adored clothes. I worked my way through college as a fashion coordinator, doing window displays and fashion shows. I was always working in retail, so if I hadn't wound up in show-biz, there's really a very solid background there. Plus, Joan Rivers Jewelry I've been designing now for 14 years…

JS: Do you think you define the word chutzpah?

JR: No. I think I define the word truth.

JS: How about one thing you'd never joke about?

JR: There's nothing. If something is funny, it's funny.

JS: Who would win in a dissing contest—you or Don Rickles?

JR: I love him. Off-stage, he would win. On-stage, I would.

JS: Meanest joke you ever told?

JR: I don't think I've made a mean joke. I think I've told the truth. A lot of people can't take the truth, or they don't want to hear it.

JS: Is there a joke you ever regretted?

JR: Not really. Years ago, I had a line in my act that Willie Nelson was so dirty he wore a roach motel around his neck. Cute. Not even a great joke. Anyway, his daughter wrote me and said, "They're teasing me in school." I took it out immediately.

JS: In the picture of you that I'm looking at, what percentage is the original Joan Rivers?

JR: This is a very good topic, because I am so f---ing sick of women who lie about it. Around eight years ago, I was sitting someplace with all these great beauties—Sophia Loren, this one, that one—who were all saying, "I've never had any work done." Well, I knew the doctors that did them. I said, "This is so unfair, to tell the public, 'I'm a natural beauty, but you're not.'" So I came out very publicly and said I've done things. Now I've become the poster girl for plastic surgery, which I don't mind. Whipping girl, I do resent. I've had a facelift, my nose thinned, and I do little bits and pieces. I think every woman should. It's maintenance. You polish your car. You repaint your house…

JS: Do you think you're more beautiful now?

JR: I never thought I was beautiful then. I don't think I'm beautiful now.

JS: Any cosmetic surgery you regret?

JR: On myself, or on friends?

JS: [Laughs.] Either.

JR: I haven't done that much, so no. But my advice is to go to a very good doctor.

JS: So which of your many endeavors has earned you the most money?

JR: None. I have never owned anything. I was an employee all my life, and now that I'm an old, has-been, over-the-hill, pathetic, dead woman with a toe tag, I'm suddenly realizing I should've owned something all these years, you stupid bitch.

JS: So you don't consider yourself rich?

JR: Oh, God no. But I've sent a lotta kids to college, taken care of a lot of friends and relatives and people around me. I've given away lots of pieces of the pie, and I've lived very, very well. My accountant the other day was yelling at me, as usual, and then he said, "But I gotta admit. You've had a great life." I don't regret one pair of Manolo Blahniks or one antique I ever bought.

JS: How about the sex life?

JR: It's been great, thank you very much.

JS: Celebrity who bugs the living shit out of you?

JR: Russell Crowe. The arrogance of this man. I've been around a long time. I've seen them come and go. I've interviewed them when they were hot, and when they were cold. And you just want to say, "If you're not enjoying it while it's happening, what a fool you are." I mean, $20 million a picture, and the world loves me and an Academy Award. Oh, that's enough to make me punch a wall. What a moron. [Laughs.]

JS: Worst-dressed woman in public life?

JR: Well, Bjork, of course, defines the whole thing.

JS: Personal motto?

JR: Never look back, and always wear blinders. Don't worry about the person next to you. Keep your eye on your own ball.

JS: OK, so when does Take Your Daughter to Work Day end and Melissa get a real job?

JR: Oh, again, this annoys the living shit outta me. Look at her life. She started out on CBS This Morning, then went to MTV and she did E! ahead of me. She's also a spokeswoman for, I think, Bounty tissues. She does all the fashion for E! She did I'm a Celebrity—Get Me out of Here! And yes, she does the fashion awards with me. But why don't people look at her career and stop picking on her because they don't like me.

JS: She's like Mini-Me. Ever consider making action figures of yourselves?

JR: Anything, if there's a buck in it. [Laughs.] Mine would be an action figure that rushes into a department store and snatches up all the shoes.

JS: In your press bio, your publicist misspelled the Hasty Pudding Club at Harvard as "Hasting Pudding." Are you afraid of angry Harvard people protesting in front of the Wilbur?

JR: That's hilarious. But those people at Harvard probably spell worse than my poor little publicist.

JS: So what's left for you to conquer?

JR: Everything. I haven't peaked yet. It may be my Broadway show that goes into rehearsal in January. I'm going to do another tour of England.

JS: So you plan to pop off while you're working?

JR: Absolutely! What else is there? This is the best business in the world. IB

THE COLLINS CARD

BY CHRIS COLLINS

TIME TO DREAM AGAIN

The Red Sox have put the 2003 season behind them. Now so should we.

Growing up in Peabody, I idolized Jim Edward Rice. One reason, among others, was that he lived in my hometown. At one point, my sister was baby-sitter to Jim Ed's kids, and he would drive her home in his Mercedes or Porsche. Life was good.

As a boy who grew up loving baseball, I remember thinking how great it would be to play like him. Rice was a Hall-of-Fame caliber player who was certain to be celebrating with New Englanders everywhere after finally winning the World Series. Forget about that long-ago-shattered dream—I now have plenty of recent painful memories of the Sox getting so close to finally doing it in 2003.

I'm fortunate to earn my living watching the Red Sox as an NECN sportscaster, and guys who've been in this business 20, 30, even 40 years have never seen a Red Sox victory parade. Here I am in my fifth year, and the carrot is so close I can almost reach out and bite it. Last year, all the anguish was finally coming to an end. The Sox clinched the wild card, scoring runs at a record pace. After beating the A's, Manny Ramirez, who hadn't said boo all spring, summer and fall, not only broke his silence but hugged me on live TV like I was his long-lost brother. A few minutes later, Lou Merloni drenched me with champagne, ruining my cell phone. No big deal—I expensed it to the station. After all, no cost is too big when a dream is about to be realized.

Next of course came the Yankees for all the marbles in the American League. It was Joe DiMaggio vs. Ted Williams. Craig Nettles vs. Bill Lee. Thurman Munson vs. Carlton Fisk. Nomar vs. Jeter. The list goes on. As much as we in New England hate to admit it, the Yankees own the Red Sox (World Series count since 1918: Yankees 26, Red Sox 0). But why not start a new count beginning in 2003—Red Sox 1, Yankees 0?

I'll never forget the ride to Game 7 at Yankee Stadium. After Game 6, when the Red Sox somehow beat Andy Pettitte to a pulp, eventually winning 9-6, David Ortiz whispered in my ear, "We are going to (bleeping) win this thing."

I agreed. How could I not? Pedro Martinez was pitching Game 7. My concern turned toward the inevitable riot back in Boston after the game. I was glad the clinching game was in the House That Ruth Built. Take that curse and shove it.

The only thing left was, well, the game. According to plan, Pedro was painting a masterpiece. The Red Sox bats sent Roger Clemens sailing, which was pretty special.

As Game 7 moved closer to the eighth inning I was going to be prepared. Heck, I've been getting ready for this for 30 years. According to my guy at the cleaners, my Hugo Boss suit wouldn't be a good mix with champagne, so I changed into my backup clothes: I put on my windbreaker, the same one I wore for the playoff-clinching win, the same one I put on when the Sox beat the A's in Oakland to get to the ALCS, the same one I would eventually wear for their World Series win. I was ready.

Cocky? Nah. Confident.

Even though I was there in person with a cameraman by my side recording everything for posterity, the eighth inning and thereafter were a blur. It's all still a blur.

Fast-forward to the start of the 2004 season, as I pack my bags to head to Baltimore for Opening Day. The Patriots have since won another Super Bowl, but the Red Sox are still on my mind. Where did Grady Little go? Todd Walker, the Red Sox' playoff MVP, is gone too. You know something is really different when Lou Merloni is sent packing (though we know he'll be back by July 4).

IT'S OPENING DAY, BUT IT FEELS LIKE OCTOBER AGAIN. INSTEAD OF YANKEE STADIUM, IT'S CAMDEN YARDS.

It's Opening Day, but it feels like October again. Instead of Yankee Stadium, it's Camden Yards in Baltimore. But I walk through the visitors' clubhouse at Camden Yards and see the April date on the wall.

Looking around, not much has changed after all. Kevin Millar is smiling. So is David Ortiz, rocking to some music. And Manny Ramirez is back to, well, being Manny Ramirez, this year sporting a hat that clearly came from P. Diddy's closet. The time warp doesn't seem to bother anybody, and for good reason. These Red Sox have convinced themselves that it's officially time to move on.

As should I. It's time to set my windbreaker aside, break down all the Red Sox problems (Pedro's fastball, Nomar's contract), and try this thing all over again.

Baseball in Boston—is there anything better? IB

beauty AND THE BOYS

WE ASKED, THEY ANSWERED. BOSTON MEN TELL US HOW THEY REALLY FEEL ABOUT THE WAY WOMEN LOOK.

BY JESSICA IREDALE

Every morning and night—and countless times in between—at mirrors across the world, women set their faces centimeters from their reflection, steady their hands and go for that last, painstakingly perfect dash of eyeliner. Except for the lowest of low-maintenance women (we're talking, soap, water and possibly ChapStick), chances are the eyeliner is only one step in a complex beauty routine designed to impress an audience composed partially of the competition (other women) and mainly of the prey: men. But are the hundreds, if not thousands, of dollars that a woman spends each year on blushes, shadows, manis, pedis, waxing and a head full of highlights wasted on a species that couldn't differentiate between smoky eyes and conjunctivitis if their lives depended on it?

In the name of all things skin deep, we surveyed a group of average Joes between the ages of 24 and 36 to find out exactly what looks men like and dislike. We covered the important topics, such as what trends should be forever banned and which hair color is most attractive. (In our extremely unscientific survey, 57 percent preferred brunette and 43 percent preferred blonde! Yet 71 percent said they notice blondes first.) Read on to learn what our guys think about what women do (or don't do) to beautify themselves.

Is there a particular hairstyle you think is especially unflattering or unattractive?

Perms. —MIKE, 29

Younger women should keep it shoulders or beyond. Really short hair is for older ladies. —JUSTIN, 27

Pigtails! —BOB, 29

The bob went out in the '20s, the scuz went out with Sinead O'Connor. Nowadays the only faux pas is bangs. Hello '80s. —NATHAN, 24

Unnatural-looking highlights. —GREGG, 35

Long, straight hair, like down to the waist. It just doesn't go anywhere, and unless you're Crystal Gayle, it looks like crap. —ANDREW, 31

What do you think about heavy eye makeup, smoky eyes, colored eye shadow?

Booooooooo. (Wait, what are "smoky eyes"?) —ANDREW, 31

I really like the whole Egyptian eye look, and smoky eyes are attractive on some women but make others look like battered wives. —NATHAN 24

Awful, awful, and awful. Don't these girls have friends? Somebody help them. —GREGG, 35

It's OK if it is tastefully done, but everything has its limits. The less a woman can get away with the better. —JUSTIN, 27

Take it easy on the eye makeup. —PATRICK, 26

Whatever. —MATT, 29

How do you feel about women applying makeup in front of you? Is it a turn-on, or do you think it should be kept in the bathroom?

Lipstick is really the only makeup I would like to see applied in my presence. I want women to look beautiful, but I'm not interested in how they do it. —NATHAN, 24

It depends where we are. If we're engaged in a conversation (i.e., at a dinner table), she might as well announce that she's a materialistic, self-indulgent, insecure person. In a more causal environment or even in the car it's fine. It's only insulting if it's in the face of a one-on-one conversation. —MIKE, 29

It's definitely a turn-on, as long as it doesn't take forever. But it's nice to be surprised if they do it in private. —HOWIE, 30

Couldn't care less. —LEIGH, 36

I have no problem with women applying makeup in front of me. Can't imagine why any man would. —GREGG, 35

What about lipstick? If you go out on a date with a woman who's wearing a bright shade, or lots of shiny lip gloss, are you less or more likely to want to kiss her?

Lipstick, no thanks. Smells funny, feels funny, tastes funny. Lip gloss, I might be more likely to want to kiss her. Is it flavored lip gloss? What flavor? Because I'm down for grape, but I don't do those foreign fruits, like kiwi and mango and all that junk. —ANDREW, 31

I don't feel that the shade of lipstick or glossy lips has anything whatsoever to do with wanting to kiss someone. —BOB, 29

I love kissing women who wear flavored lip gloss, since it tastes good and gives me some extra sheen. I do not like kissing women who are wearing globs of bright lipstick, since it just gets messy. Although a perfectly planted smooch on the cheek with some hooker-red color can make a guy look like the man. —NATHAN, 24

Is it a turnoff when you get into bed with a girl and her legs aren't perfectly shaved?

I would never ask for perfectly shaved legs all the time. When they grow out of control, or stubble begins to draw blood, is when it becomes an issue.
—BOB, 29

Yes! But I understand if it has been a day or two. A tiny amount of stubble is normal, but four or five days worth is almost insulting. —MIKE, 29

Just as long as they have been shaved within the last two days. —ZACH, 26

Only if she's ugly. —LEIGH, 36

Does perfume affect your attraction to a woman? Do you even notice it? Is there a particular scent you're attracted to or that you're offended by?

Yes, perfume is noticed. I like soft floral scents. —MATT, 29

Subtle, subtle, subtle. I don't want to smell the girl before I see her! I want to barely notice that she's even wearing any. Otherwise I wonder what it is she's trying to cover up! —GREGG, 35

Yes, very much so! I love Oui and Happy and B&B Juniper Breeze and Sun-Ripened Raspberry on a woman. I hate the smell of baby powder and anything that smells like what an old woman would wear. —JASON, 27

I should only smell it after I've made the decision to get close. —LEIGH, 36

It definitely heightens the attraction to someone in whom I'm already interested. I don't think it would make me notice someone I'm not otherwise attracted to, though. On the flip side, it can be a total turn-off when the scent is too strong and overpowering, or if it's the scent my grandmother wears. —HOWIE, 30

Just like everything else in life, moderation is key. I like perfume, since it's much better than body odor. At the same time, too much of even the best smell can kill the night. I like most perfumes but really hate coconut and Bath & Body Works fruity stuff—makes me ill. —NATHAN, 24

What are your feelings on bikini lines? What's your ideal: Brazilian (landing strip); trimmed, but not porn-star style; au natural; or not a strand in sight? Have you ever encountered a bikini line you didn't like?

Bald kind of wigs me out. I like the yard to have really nice edgework—the length of the grass on the interior is less important. —MIKE, 29

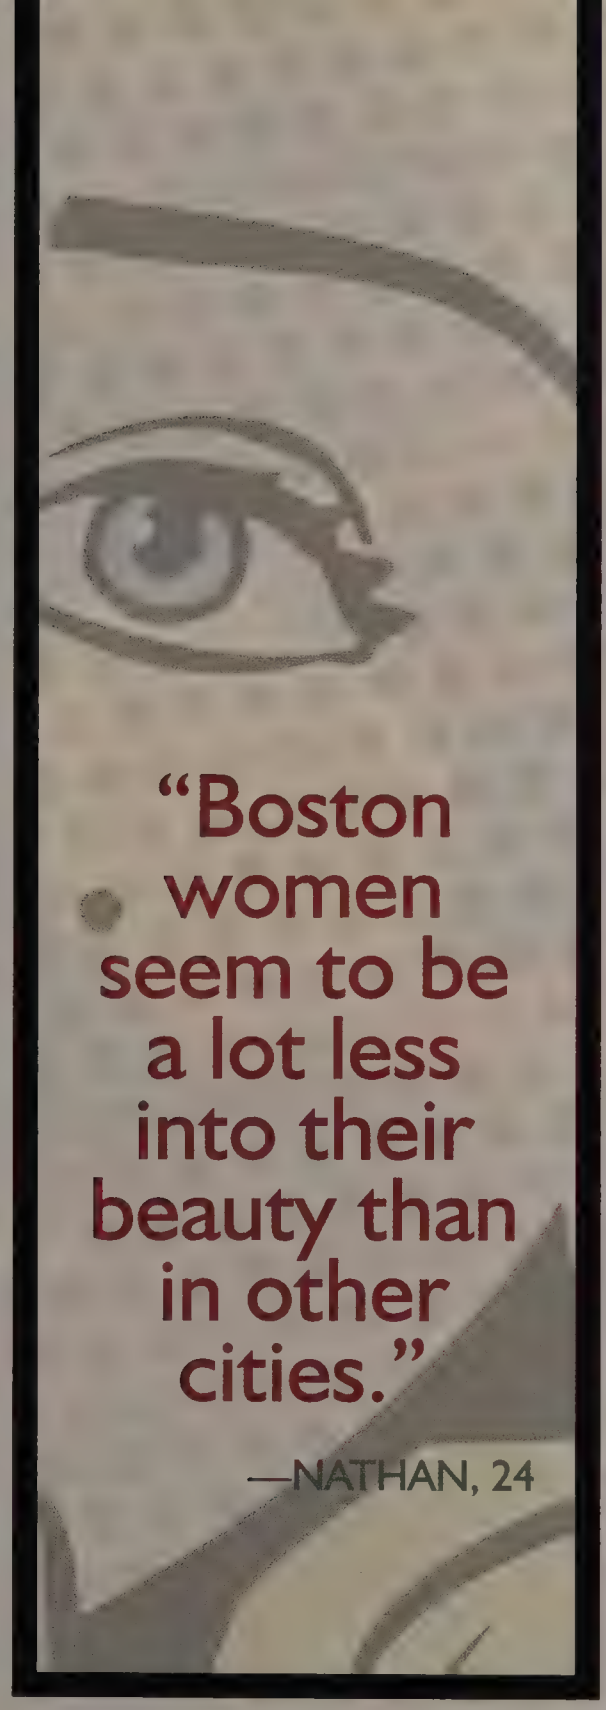
No preference, but there should be grass on the field.
—LEIGH, 36

As long as it's in check, it's fine with me. —JUSTIN, 27

I'd say any of the above—except if "au natural" looks like a forest, get to work with some hedge clippers.
—ANDREW, 31

I like a trimmed triangle. —JASON, 27

Oh boy, touchy subject. I think you said it correctly: "Trimmed, but not porn-star style." Well-maintained.
—BOB, 29



What's a beauty routine (or hairstyle or makeup trend) you wish you could permanently put an end to?

Just go easy on the makeup. Not to sound like your dad, but it makes a lot of you look like drag queens. —ANDREW, 31

Blow-drying. Sometimes it messes up the reception on my TV. —MIKE, 29

This new "bring back the '80s," flare-hairstyles-and-makeup look has got to go. It's not funny or fun.
—BOB, 29

Caked-on makeup. —PAUL, 25

How do you feel about women who get plastic surgery?

Gross. —PATRICK, 26

Gross. —BOB, 29

Not into it. —PAUL, 25

I don't have to worry about that. My wife already has implants. —ZACH, 26

What's one beauty ritual you think should be mandatory for all women?

Leg waxing/shaving, as well as armpit hair removal.
—NATHAN, 24

Exercise. —GREGG, 35

Removal of facial hair—lip and chin. —JASON, 27

Keeping their body hair under control—especially in the nether regions. —HOWIE, 30

Grooming downstairs.
—JUSTIN, 27

How do Boston women compare with women you've known in other cities? Is there any particular characteristic of Boston women's beauty routine or look that is noticeably different?

No question about it, Boston women are fat. Not trying to be mean, but they are. And generally speaking, not nearly as good-looking as in most major U.S. cities. And they have undeserved attitudes. Problem is, you get women in Boston that are a "7" walking around with the attitude of a "10" because they can. Most other cities, they would never get noticed. But in Boston they can strut around like a supermodel.
—GREGG, 35

Boston women seem to be a lot less into their beauty than in other cities. I think this must have something to do with the population as well as the weather. In the prolonged winter months, I feel as if some women let themselves go. Many do not shave their legs. This is not seen in warmer cities where bathing-suit season is year-round. I also feel as if women in Boston just do not put in as much time to "put themselves together" as women in New York do. Compared with my experience in other big cities, the women of Boston are high-spirited and nice but do not cut the cake when it comes to beauty. —NATHAN, 24

Without the constant warm season, I think our Boston ladies do just fine. It's not fair to compare them with say, So-Cal women, who are in the sun all year round. If we can just work on their attitudes a bit, I think we'd all be a lot happier. —MATT, 29 iB

THE SPAS OF LIFE

BORED WITH THE SAME OLD FACIAL, PEDICURE ROUTINE? SHAKE THINGS UP WITH OUT-OF-THE-ORDINARY OFFERINGS AT LOCAL SPAS.

PHOTOGRAPH BY DEREK KOUYOUMJIAN

Stroll down Newbury Street (or almost any retail-heavy city block, for that matter) and take a look around. Day spas and salons appear in numbers to rival the boutiques and galleries. Pampering is in no short supply in this city, and if you look beyond the basic treatments (Swedish massages, clarifying facials and seaweed wraps), you'll find some off-the-wall offerings that will raise your impeccably groomed eyebrows. Seeking to separate gimmick from godsend, we tested some of the more unique services available. Here are a few worth checking out.

CHINESE HERBOLOGY WRAP

Since this was my first body treatment, I arrived at Daryl Christopher Salon and Day Spa for my Chinese Herbology Wrap expecting to be slathered with green lotions and bound like a mummy. In fact, the 75-minute treatment began with an oil massage. After I changed into the disposable underwear, I lay facedown on the heated table while aesthetician Waneeta Jones massaged oil down my back and legs. Then she sprinkled the brown, dried herbs over me to create a scratchy paste that calmed, soothed and exfoliated my skin. (The herbs are also said to alleviate water retention.) Halfway through, I moved to my back and she repeated the process on my arms, stomach and legs. After about an hour, Jones told me to get comfortable as she wrapped me in a heated foil sheet (like a baked potato) and blanket and set up heat lights; the idea here is the herbs are absorbed through the skin, and toxins are released through perspiration. Fifteen minutes later, I unwrapped to find the brown paste had virtually disappeared. I jumped in the shower (in room) to remove the excess oil and herbs and found my skin soft as a newborn's bottom. Daryl Christopher Salon and Day Spa, 37 Newbury St., Boston (617-424-0250). $150. —Jessica Iredale

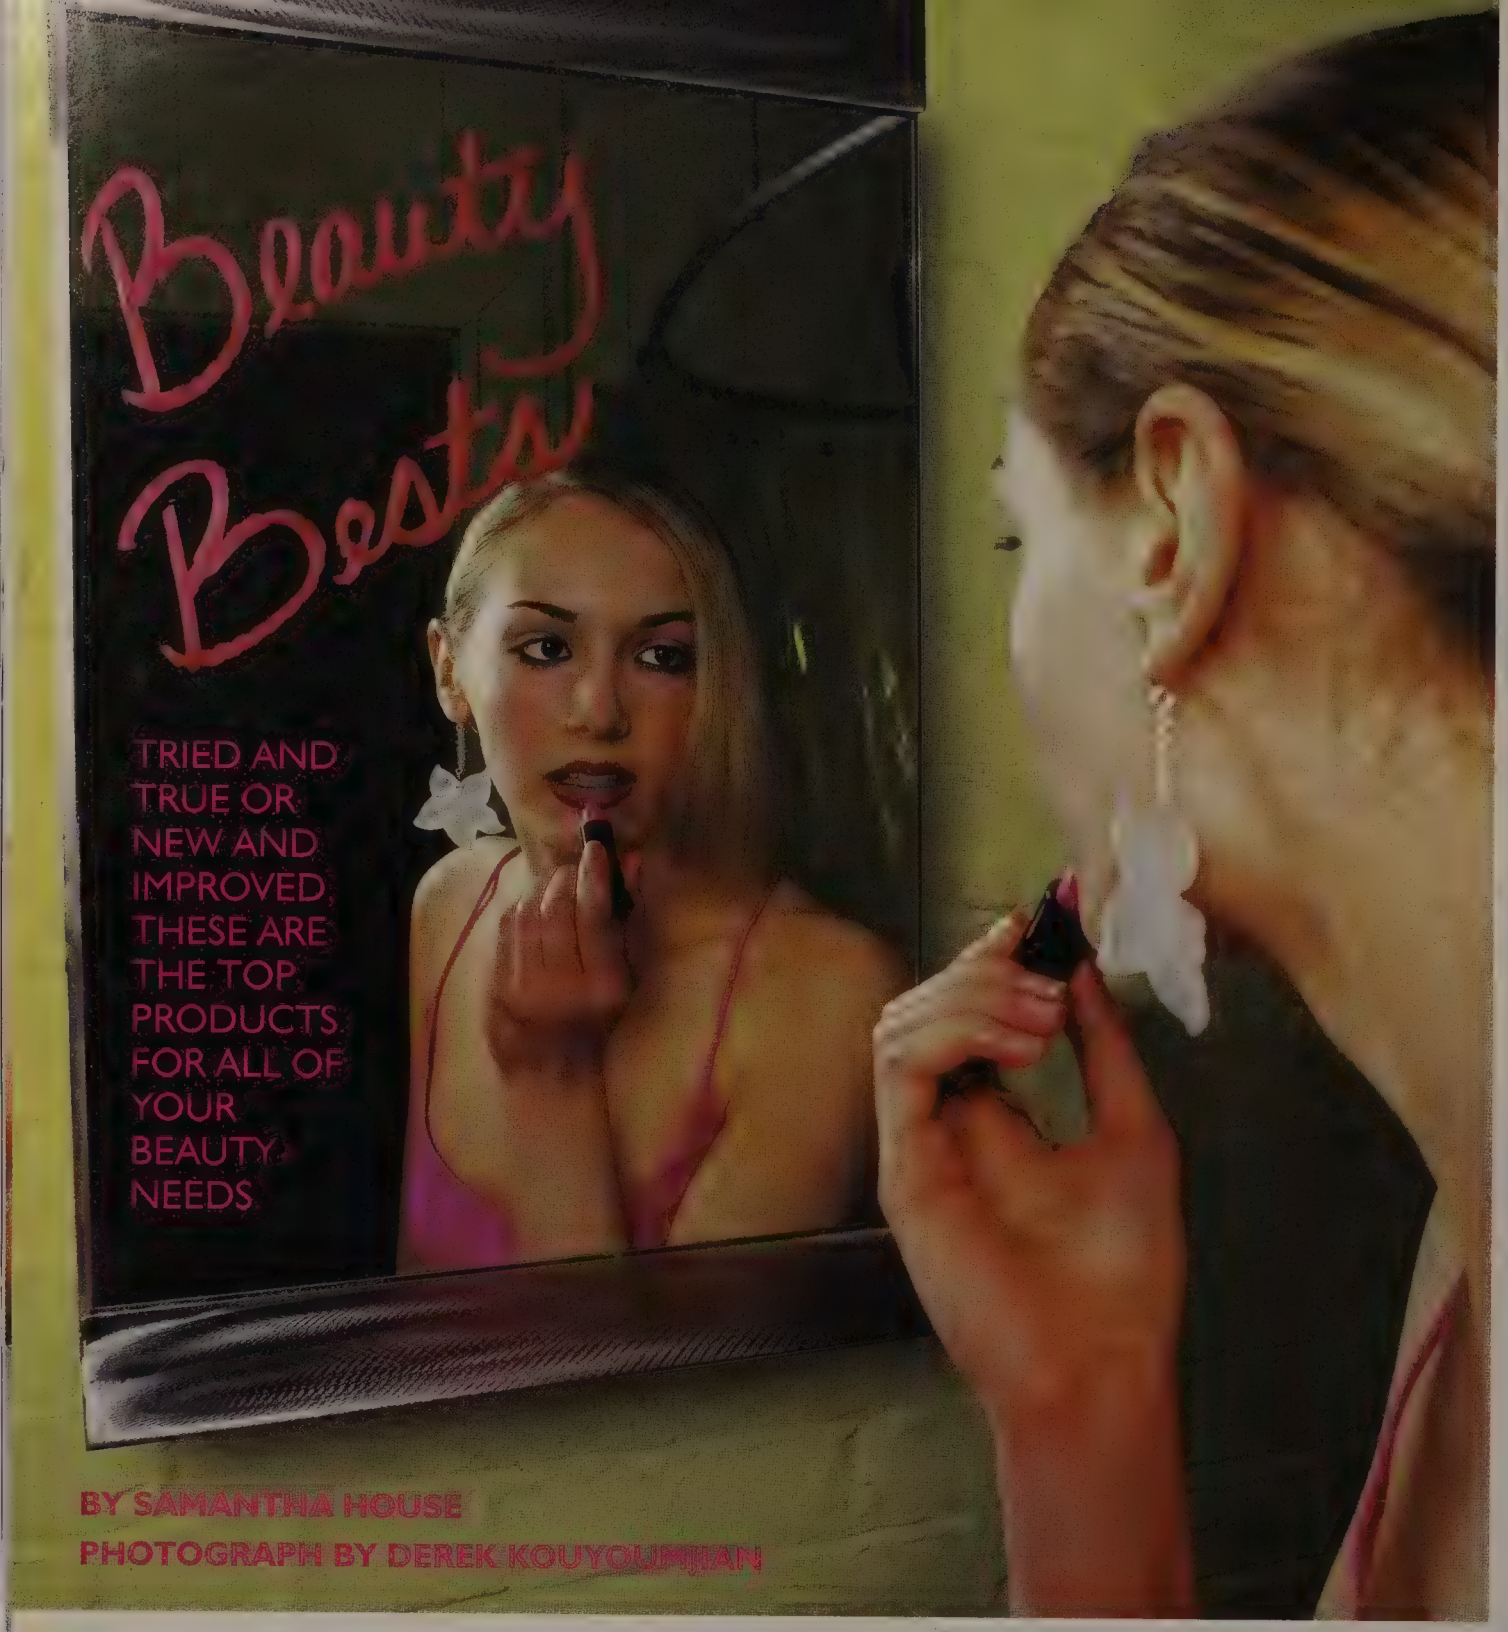
CRANIOSACRAL THERAPY

I rarely fall asleep on an airplane or when I'm riding in a car. Nor do I nap. So I was shocked when I found myself dozing off during a 50-minute session of craniosacral therapy at Giuliano Spa for Beauty and Wellness. I lay down on the table fully clothed, and therapist Patty Sweeney put one hand under my left hip bone and the other on top, exerting slight pressure from above and below. Then she went around my body, doing the same on my shoulders, neck, ears (gently pushing inward with her thumbs) and the top of my head, before returning to the right hip. The purpose of this therapy, which was developed by Dr. John Upledger in the 1970s, is to improve the flow of the cerebrospinal fluid that surrounds and protects the brain and the spinal cord, thereby enhancing natural healing processes. It's said to help alleviate pain associated with migraines, sinusitis and allergies; scoliosis; TMJ and stress- and tension-related problems. It worked wonders on me…once I woke up. Giuliano Spa for Beauty and Wellness, 338 Newbury St., Boston (617-262-2220). $90. —Julie Suratt

PURE-SCRIPTION SCALP TREATMENT

Before walking into Adamo Day Spa, I'd had one previous scalp massage, and that one was really more like an extended noogie. No such worries here, as therapist Linda Movessian managed to rub the French Phyto brand scalp and hair oil onto my head with nary an agitated follicle. It's one of the idiosyncrasies of the human body that having your hair pulled hard is searingly painful, but having it pulled gently is pleasant enough to lull you to sleep. After my formerly dessicated mop was properly soaked with the oils, Movessian fitted an electric warming wrap on my head that made me look like Lord Dark Helmet in Spaceballs but felt mighty nice. You can get a facial while the warming wrap is doing its thing, and through the end of April the 30-minute scalp treatment is free with purchase of a steam and a facial or one-hour massage. Noogie not included. Adamo Day Spa, 5 Stagecoach Way, Cohasset Village (781-383-3011). $35. —Ezra Dyer

CHAMPAGNE FACIAL



Believe it or not, the Champagne portion of my Champagne Facial at Spring Rain Spa wasn't served in a glass (although a few sips wouldn't have hurt anyone). This rejuvenating facial treatment uses the purported anti-aging and skin-firming benefits of Champagne yeast to promote collagen production and, according to spa owner Natalya Kushpel, "neutralize the damaging effects of free radicals." After I settled comfortably on the table, the aesthetician used a steam machine to open my pores, and then began a face, neck, shoulder and hand massage. Next, she cleansed, exfoliated, rehydrated and performed extractions on my skin. She explained each product and step as she went (a gentle enzyme for exfoliation, a foam mask for moisture). The Champagne yeast (which smelled surprisingly like grape bubble gum) did what was promised. After 75 minutes, my face was smooth, supple and less puffy. I'll drink to that. Spring Rain Face and Body Spa, Reservoir Plaza, 475 Winter St., Waltham (781-895-0010). $95. —Andrea Tolland

MENAGE-À-SPA

Despite this treatment's seductive name, nothing untoward happened when I went to get my facial/manicure/pedicure at G Spa. I'd experienced all three services before, but not all at once. While the aesthetician scrubbed, masked and extracted, the nail technician went to work on my toes and fingertips. When they were finished, 50 minutes had gone by and I was walking out the door feeling groomed and pretty. This is a great service for people who have little time or no tolerance for long, drawn-out spa treatments. G Spa, 35 Newbury St., Boston (617-267-4772). $120. —Samantha House

POLARITY THERAPY

Polarity therapy sounds like something you'd see a shrink for, but it's actually a massage treatment developed by Dr. Randolph Stone to balance the body's energy systems (water, heat and air) and release blocked energy. I began my hour-long session at Étant lying on a massage table, fully clothed, minus shoes and socks. Spa owner and polarity therapist Scott St. Cyr cradled my head in his hands and gently pulled to stretch my neck and create space in my upper vertebrae, and then moved to my feet, so I could feel the stretch in my back. After a head, neck, shoulder, foot and ankle massage, he told me he was using his positive and negative poles to move blocked energy. Translation: he applied light pressure to the center of my palms and the bases of my feet, and then again to my upper arm and upper thigh. Next, I rolled onto my stomach and he worked his way up my back, squeezing each vertebra individually. On my way out, St. Cyr imparted words of wisdom, which felt kind of like a horoscope reading. Apparently I'm easily intimidated and give my power away. How he knew that from a little massage is beyond me. Regardless, I left feeling relaxed and centered. Étant, 524 Tremont St., Boston (617-423-5040). $80.

Man in the Mirror

IF YOU'RE STILL USING DISPOSABLE RAZORS AND PERT PLUS, IT'S TIME TO WAKE UP AND SMELL THE AFTERSHAVE, BOYS, AND PUT A LITTLE MORE THOUGHT INTO YOUR GROOMING ROUTINE.

BY SAMANTHA HOUSE
PHOTOGRAPH BY DEREK KOUYOUMJIAN

Every man's bathroom should include the following essentials:

1. A FACIAL CLEANSER

A good cleanser that deep-cleans but does not strip your face of essential oils is the first step in having a Brad Pitt–like complexion. Try a basic cleanser like Cetaphil (at drugstores) or men's facial cleanser from Fresh (121 Newbury St.). But please, don't include in your daily routine any product that contains benzoyl peroxide—it's harsh on your skin.

2. AN EXFOLIANT

You know all those little ingrown hairs that you battle on a regular basis? You can get rid of most of them easily by exfoliating (sloughing off the dead skin with a mild abrasive material). Spa Nordstrom facial exfoliant (at Nordstrom.com) is a good one. Use it before you shave—it'll be the best shave of your life

3. A MOISTURIZER

If you're at all worried about having skin like leather by the time you're 50, you should be using a moisturizer on your entire face at least once per day. If you just want to get rid of flaky or dry skin, you can buy a bottle and keep it around to apply when you need it. Try Kiehl's Ultra Facial Moisturizer (available at Kiehl's, 112 Newbury St.).

4. A GOOD RAZOR

Throwaway razors are a no-no now that the Gillette Mach3 has come into the world. Own it. It's the best. Ideally, you should use a new blade each time you shave, but that can get a little pricey, so at the very least, make sure to dry it off after each use to prevent rusting.

5. SHAMPOO AND CONDITIONER

The right shampoo is one that cleans and doesn't dry out your hair. If you don't use conditioner now, you should start. It keeps your hair healthy looking and makes it easier to style. Try the L'Oréal Vive line. There's even one for preventing hair loss.

6. AFTERSHAVE

It's a good idea to keep on hand a simple aftershave lotion to prevent razor burn. Use something light, without color or fragrance, to avoid irritation.

7. BODY CLEANSER

Get rid of any white, milky soap—it leaves a residue on your body. Try glycerin soap instead. If you want to get an even better clean, use a mesh sponge, available at drugstores. It will lightly exfoliate while you scrub.

Tip: All out of shaving cream but desperate for a shave? Use hair conditioner instead. It'll soften your beard and give you a great finish. Just be sure to wash your face afterward to avoid breakouts

Tip: If you're trying a new regime start with one new produc for a week and see how it fects your skin. Then add the next product. That way, you know which one's the culpri if something goes awry.

Tip: When buying a new product choose the simplest formula. Select items that have no color or fragrance; they're less likely to make you break out.

A BRIEF INQUIRY INTO THE GOLDEN AGE OF CONFECTION IN THE BOSTON AREA — AND THE TRAGIC EXODUS OF CANDY MAKERS

BY STEVE ALMOND

When the New England Confectionery Company moved out of its storied factory on Mass. Avenue last year, the entire neighborhood lost something precious: a smell. Anyone who lives or works within sniffing distance of the south Cambridge plant knows exactly what I'm talking about. On those afternoons when the company was cranking out its trademark wafers, the air was redolent with the scent of Neccos—orange and lemon and cinnamon.

The same thing happened over on Cambridge Street, where Necco shut down a second, smaller factory. Gone were the rich aromas of chocolate, mint and caramel, which wafted over the surrounding blocks like a blessing.

The Necco folks are over in Revere now, in a modernized facility where they continue to crank out wafers, conversation hearts and Clark Bars. In a cruel irony, Cambridge several years ago designated the water tower that sits atop the factory—and is painted in the style of a giant package of Neccos—a historical landmark. So there it remains. But nobody with a functioning nose will be fooled. The building now houses a pharmaceutical concern called Novartis. Yum yum.

Of course, Boston-area residents should recognize this pattern by now. Most of us have seen the giant Schrafft's sign next to I-93 in Charlestown. For years, this sign announced the nation's largest candy factory, a 900,000-square-foot building where some 1,500 employees cranked out Schrafft's world-famous boxed chocolates. But the candy maker went under in 1984, and today the Schrafft Center houses a variety of...software offices. That's how it's gone down in Boston. Once considered the nation's capital of confection, our burg is now more like a candy ghost town, haunted by the misleading signs and the sweet specter of what once was.

A CHOCOLATE REVOLUTION

Boston's confectionary history dates back to the Revolutionary War. Or, to be more precise, a decade earlier. As is often the case in these parts, the saga begins with an Irish immigrant. Specifically, a fellow named John Hannon who, in 1765, built the nation's first chocolate mill on the banks of the Neponset River, in Dorchester. Boston was an ideal location, a big, bustling port town where cocoa beans could make landfall on their voyage over from Africa.

Hannon's factory survived well into the 20th century. Walter Marshall, a retired Necco executive who used to walk by the factory as a child, says he could taste the chocolate in the air.

Marshall is something of a historian of Boston's candied past. The city's first confectioners, he notes, weren't companies in the modern sense. Forget about industrial mixers and assembly lines. These early candy makers were family operations where everything was done by hand, right in the back room.

The dawn of the industrial age—and specifically the steam engine—brought about profound changes. For the first time, local companies were able to mass-produce candies using machines.

The most prominent example was the lozenge cutter, which was patented by Oliver R. Chase in 1847. Chase produced the dry, sugary wafers that later become known as Neccos. The candies were a staple of the Union soldiers who fought in the Civil War, providing a quick, sugary jolt to the troops. So, although this may be stretching the point, it would be technically accurate to say that Neccos played a role in the abolition of slavery in this country. (All that and delicious flavor!)

Marshall notes that Neccos—"a virtually indestructible candy"—have also made the trip to the North and South poles.

That was only the beginning for Boston's sweets industry. The first half of the 20th century was, to hear Marshall tell it, our candy heyday. The city was home to 140 companies by 1950, with sales of $200 million per year. Downtown boasted a quartet of chocolate factories: Royal, Cole, Haviland and Liberty. Back then, on production days, the most prominent smell in the North End wasn't garlic, but chocolate.

Necco's own Sky Bar—a slab of milk chocolate infused with four distinct fillings—was among the most popular bars on the East Coast. Marshall still remembers when the bar was introduced, in 1938: "We used a skywriting campaign, naturally."

But the highest concentration of candy production was actually north of the river, on Cambridge's Main Street, which was known as Confectioner's Row.

Here, in the space of less than a mile, seven companies contributed to the national level of tooth decay: James O. Welch (Junior Mints and Sugar Daddies), Jack Smiley (hard candies), Graylock Confection (a marshmallow candy called Tweet), Dagget (chocolates), Fox-Cross (Charleston Chew), C.A. Briggs (candy cough drops) and Deran (chocolate and taffy).

Bob Stengal remembers all these companies. For three decades, Stengal worked nearby as the general manager of Squirrel Brand Company, which has produced various taffies, including the eponymous Squirrel Nut Zipper, since 1888.

Unfortunately, his neighbors gradually started disappearing. They would sell out, or relocate, or go under. Most painfully, the managers at these plants would often call Stengal to ask his advice.

Once the nation's capital of confection, our burg is now more like a candy ghost town

What, exactly, was behind all these failing candy concerns? In a word: consolidation. Over the past few decades, the Big Three candy makers—Hershey's, Mars and Nestlé—have gotten bigger and bigger, and they've either gobbled up smaller companies, or driven them under. Consolidation has affected distribution and retail, as well. In the age of Wal-Mart, smaller companies can't hope to compete against multinational giants. They can't afford to pay the "slotting fees" that chains charge to place products in desirable shelf locations. Nor can they hope to compete against zillion-dollar advertising budgets.

But Marshall is careful to note that simple geography was also a factor. "It used to be distribution wasn't as complicated, because everything was local," he observes. "But once you started to get national distribution, it made more sense to be centrally located, especially with all the westward expansion. The transportation costs were lower." That's why Chicago had replaced Boston as the nation's candy mecca by the 1950s.

The bottom line is this: By 1999, Squirrel Brand was the last independent, family-owned candy factory in Cambridge. And then, Stengal says, the unthinkable happened: the company was sold and relocated—to Texas, of all places. He had hoped that Necco might rescue Squirrel Brand by making an 11th-hour purchase of the company. But he wasn't exactly shocked when the end came. "Cambridge is not a friendly city to manufacturers anymore," Stengal notes ruefully, "unless you're in high tech or biotech."

As fate would have it, though, the two companies recently inked a deal that licenses Squirrel Nut Zippers and Squirrel Nut Chews to Necco, which will manufacture the bars at its new Revere plant. After a year-long absence, Zippers and Chews will be back on the market this summer.

FROM CHELSEA TO CHARLESTON

If you want to know just how much Boston's candy landscape has changed over the past century, there's no one better equipped to tell you than Nate Sloane.

As a 16-year-old living in a Chelsea tenement, Sloane first entered the candy biz in 1925, as a distributor. "We used wagons in those days," he says. "The little guys bought candy for the same amount as the big guys. And the cost back then! I used to be able to buy two half-pound bars of Hershey's or Nestlé for a quarter. Can you imagine being able to buy a pound of good chocolate for a quarter?"

In his first dozen years in the business, Sloane took over half a dozen local distribution routes. This was long before the days of corporate chains, of course. Taking over another distributor's route was as simple as a cash payment and a handshake.

But Sloane says his real dream was to manufacture a successful candy bar, to be, as he puts it, "the bottom-line seller." In 1955, he purchased Fox-Cross, which produced a chocolate-covered taffy bar known as the Charleston Chew. He immediately set about modernizing the company. Unfortunately, this meant moving from Cambridge to Everett three years later. "We needed a bigger factory. We went from 8,000 square feet to 55,000."

In some sense, Sloane says, this move was the beginning of the end for him and the bar. He wound up having so much success with the Charleston Chew that a number of the big candy firms, including Hershey's, offered to buy him out. In 1980, he finally gave in and sold the business to Nabisco.

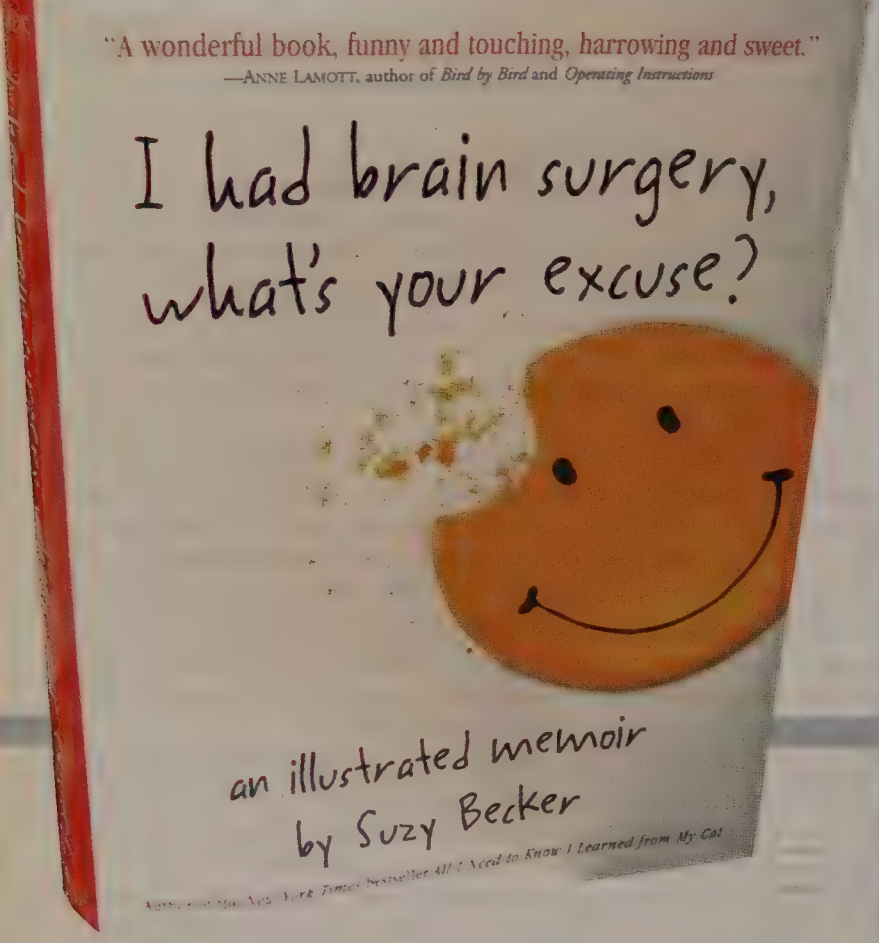
Fox-Cross then suffered a fate typical of the industry. Nabisco sold the business to the drug firm Warner Lambert, which sold it, in 1993, to Tootsie Roll Industries. Ironically, the Chicago-based company moved the production of Charleston Chews back to Cambridge. It had previously purchased the remains of another storied local outfit, the James O. Welch Company.

Today, the Cambridge Brands factory, at 810 Main St., is the only remaining candy maker on Confectioner's Row, which is why nearby residents can still catch a whiff of Junior Mints or Sugar Babies being produced. This, however, comes as little consolation to Nate Sloane, who for a time continued to visit friends at the plant after he retired. These days, he says, the factory has lost the friendly, family atmosphere that used to pervade it.

For local residents more interested in the consumption side of the sweets business, there are, of course, plenty of upscale options to choose from.

But if, like me, you're one of those candy freaks who prefers to buy yours in bulk, the greatest loss in recent years is the Candy Shoppe, the tiny seconds store on the first floor of Necco's former chocolate factory. It was there that I went on a weekly basis to buy boxes of pecan turtles, Clark Bars and chocolate-covered raisins at obscenely low prices. I used to be able buy a three-pound box of the positively delectable Haviland Thin Mints for $1.79. (Need I say more?)

A few weeks ago, I was passing by the old factory, when suddenly my heart leapt and I pulled my car over, jumped out and half-sprinted to the shop window.



The Shoppe was empty of course—but the sign was still up on the side of the building. IB

ALL I NEED IS MY SENSE OF HUMOR

Central Mass. resident and former Radcliffe fellow Suzy Becker's latest book, I Had Brain Surgery, What's Your Excuse?, is an amusing illustrated memoir about her ordeal with a brain tumor.

Please understand that this is a completely nondepressing—and in fact, funny—book about a terrifying subject: brain surgery. The surger-ee is writer-cartoonist Suzy Becker, who called upon her ingrained techniques of irreverence and charming nuttiness during her ordeal. The book, which also follows the roller coaster Becker was on with her lover, Karen, has a good narrative flow in and of itself. But the Becker touch scintillates most in imagined interviews with NPR host Terry Gross, jokey charts and graphs purporting to measure this and that (a Disappointment Time Line begins with "Doll Clothes I Got for Christmas Don't Fit Doll I Got for Christmas") and streams of frisky self-talk in italics; wondering, refuting, sardonically commenting on treatments and feelings. From the margins comes "Augusta! My Imaginary Medical Superheroine," with twisty hornlike hair and a cape, giving bossy advice like "Ask her what to expect. Now." Post-surgery, the author endures some slushy pronunciation and word-confusion, along with love troubles, but the book wittily illustrates that by the end she's back to Becker.

Photographer Martin R. Anderson uses wildly different cameras. Among his tools are a WWII-e Leica and a small plastic camera once given away by banks. But he mostly relies on incredibly lo tech, black-and-white "pinhole" cameras. These consist of any old cylinder—a cookie box, a film ca ister—into which photographic paper is rolled. This film is exposed, somewhat willy-nilly, through tiny hole in the side of the cylinder. The result is haunting. Some ghost in the unconscious seems be at work as Anderson captures angels, statues and solitary landscapes. The roundness of the came bends the picture a bit, making it eerie and intimate. The image is in focus just as the human eye se it, so a shot taken from beneath the Longfellow Bridge shows clearly defined rocks in the foregroun an expanse of silky, sheeny dark water in the middle, and equally focused Boston in the distanc Sometimes it seems as if some psychic hurricane has left the scene melancholy and still. One fog picture taken in April 2001 across the Brooklyn Bridge shows some huddling shapes on the left, loo ing almost incidental or apologetic—the Twin Towers, soon to perish.

WHERE'S THE BEEF?

Delightful food and tiny portions make for a glass half full at the Butcher Shop

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY BERTA A. DANIELS

Thanks to celebrated chef Barbara Lynch, you can enjoy surf and turf by walking across the street from one of her new South End restaurants to the other. As reported in these pages two weeks ago, Lynch's B&G Oysters charms both neighborhood aficionados and Lynch devotees across the city with its pristinely fresh raw oysters and its skillfully cooked seafood. In an exercise of "separate but equal" gastronomy, Lynch's other new venture combines a full-service butcher shop, retailing prime cuts of meat, farm-raised poultry, and charcuterie, with a limited-menu restaurant serving a selection of meat dishes.

The Butcher Shop, occupying the southeastern corner of the Waltham/Tremont Street intersection, suffers by comparison with its seafood sibling across the street. Although the two restaurants are approximately equal in size, B&G, designed with efficient functionality and style, seems larger and more comfortable and inviting. The Butcher Shop seats about 28 diners, half of them at the bar. Some of its space is given over to a glass-doored refrigerator exhibiting impressive looking cuts of fresh meat, patés and sausages, while more sausages and hams hang from an imposing wrought iron rack. Large, storefront windows admit lots of light and look out on the lively street life of the South End, and slate walls give the interior an engaging patina.

The Butcher Shop's menu contains fewer than a dozen offerings, ranging in price from $11 to $22, though there were some higher-priced menu items at the time of my visits. The antipasti della casa ($16) featured cured meats garnished with olives, figs, almonds and cheese. These were exquisite cold cuts from Italy's culinary heartland, Emilia Romagna—sopressata, a dry, yet rich and provocatively spiced sausage; salami, moist and garlicky; and prosciutto, at once sweet and salty with the satiny texture that distinguishes imported from domestic. Unfortunately, all three were served in such minuscule portions as to shock the conscience in view of their considerable tariff. The promised Parmigiano-Reggiano cheese, another of Emilia Romagna's exquisite products, consisted of a few paltry crumbles. To add insult to injury, the antipasti appeared to emerge directly from a refrigerator, assembled in advance—the plate was telltale cold.

So dismayed was I at the lack of value in the antipasti, despite its fine ingredients, that other shortcomings of my first meal at the Butcher Shop reaffirmed my displeasure. For example, one evening's special, fresh housemade tagliatelle ($16), came to the table lukewarm, bordering on cool, and was overcooked to boot. The pasta's tepid temperature and disappointing texture made it difficult to appreciate the rich, meaty, well-seasoned Bolognese sauce that dressed it. Moreover, I had advised our waiter that my companion and I planned to share the pasta as a classic "primo" course, hoping that it would be divided and separately plated in the kitchen. Instead, it arrived stacked on one plate, in the cliched "tall food" mode, and we had to move half of it to a second plate ourselves.

After the disappointing antipasti and pasta courses, things got better on that first visit. The foie gras torchon ($25)—the word means cooked while wrapped in a towel—was voluptuously rich, and its generous size almost did justice to its price. (The dish has since been downsized, and is now $18.) While the foie gras could have stood on its own, it profited by its garnish of Sauternes gelee, an aspic made from Bordeaux's most celebrated dessert wine, which is often sipped as an accompaniment to foie gras. A further enhancement, a slice of thick, buttery, eggy brioche toast, disappointed only in its size, far too small to accommodate the hefty portion of foie gras.

The Sauternes gelee so delighted me that I resolved to view the Butcher Shop as a glass half full rather than half empty. For example, I forgave the diminutive size of a skewer of housemade sausages ($20)—a half link each of boudin blanc (white sausage), Italian sausage flavored with fennel, and a very slender, almost tiny, link of merguez, a North African sausage that frequently accompanies couscous. Rounding out this "mixed grill," as it was called on the menu, was a small block of pork belly confit, unsmoked bacon that was flavorful, mellow and slightly sweet. Despite my surprise at the small portion and the fact that only three of the several varieties of sausage mentioned on the menu (which also included black truffle and pistachio, garlic and venison, among others) were featured, I focused on the substantial merits of the individual ingredients, and relished in an unexpected and unannounced treat that accompanied the sausage: braised lettuce.

On a second visit, I chose the steak tartare ($16) as a starter. This flawless, robustly flavored raw tenderloin, coarsely chopped and combined with capers, cornichons, black pepper and extra-virgin olive oil, was as good an exemplar of this splendid dish as I have ever encountered. A piquant preparation, its richness and complexity more than compensated for its moderate size. Served in a small dish that could have passed as a custard bowl, the tartare led me to conclude that the restaurant's poor public relations in regard to its portion sizes could be remedied by a more skillful presentation. The steak tartare, according to the menu, was to have been accompanied by haricots verts (green beans)

The Butcher Shop occupies a South End corner opposite its sister restaurant, B&G Oysters.

Butcher Peter Metsch

Steak tartare with toasted brioche and pickled onions

but all that appeared alongside it were pickled pearl onions. When I called this fact to my waiter's attention, he explained "we ran out" of the beans, and that was that. (The Butcher Shop has changed the steak tartare dish since my visit, and the pickled onions are now standard.) My face must have betrayed my disappointment, for after a moderate interval, he brought me an elegant, long white platter containing at one end a lobe of sautéed foie gras and buttery toast rounds with a garnish of candied pistachios, and on the other, another thick slice of the magnificent foie gras torchon with its Sauternes gelee. While I like green beans, the substitution of this culinary tour de force more than compensated for their absence.

The last menu offering I tried, the grilled Cuban sandwich ($13), consisted of a felicitous combination of shards of grilled pork confit, sweet ham, Swiss cheese and slices of housemade pickles—a creatively conceived, delicious symphony of tastes. This time, the serving—three half sandwiches on first-rate, toasted hard-crusted bread—was as generous as many of the other servings had been sparse. Combined with the surprising, midmeal amuse bouche—boy was my bouche amused—of the double foie gras extravaganza, this sudden quantum leap in serving size led me to conclude that my identity had been divined by the house.

The Butcher Shop has an excellent wine list, predominantly Italian and French, far larger than the restaurant's small size and limited menu would suggest. Particularly good, and value priced, was the 2001 Clos la Coutale Cahors ($25), a dry red from southwestern France. This traditional accompaniment to cassoulet made a particularly good foil for the rich, pleasantly fatty sausages. Moving to the Italian side of the wine list, I thoroughly enjoyed the Lacrima di Morro d'Alba by Mario Lucchetti ($26), whose forward fruit and good acid produced a structured wine that went well with the food.

Service at the Butcher Shop, in contrast to B&G, seemed a bit disorganized. The waiter on both of my visits was congenial, but he was not particularly well informed about the food or the wine. His manner, which ranged from courtly to languid, could have profited from an injection of the energy and efficiency that reign across the street at B&G.

Finally, a note about value. As any regular reader of this column knows, I am not a partisan of supersize portions. However, the scanty slices of cold cuts and miserly morsels of cheese that constituted the antipasti bordered on scandalous. The mixed grill, with its half links of sausages, was accompanied by a spoonful of lentils that would barely have filled a thimble. Even the cost of the Butcher Shop's distinguished provisions cannot justify such a disconnect between price and portion. Somewhere, somehow, there must be a golden mean—portions that satisfy rather than surfeit; tapas-size portions at tapas prices. As the Butcher Shop fine-tunes its conception and its execution, hopefully it will arrive at that place. iB

Loaves' Labors Lost?

TV or not TV?...Kebab-N-Kurry kaput...

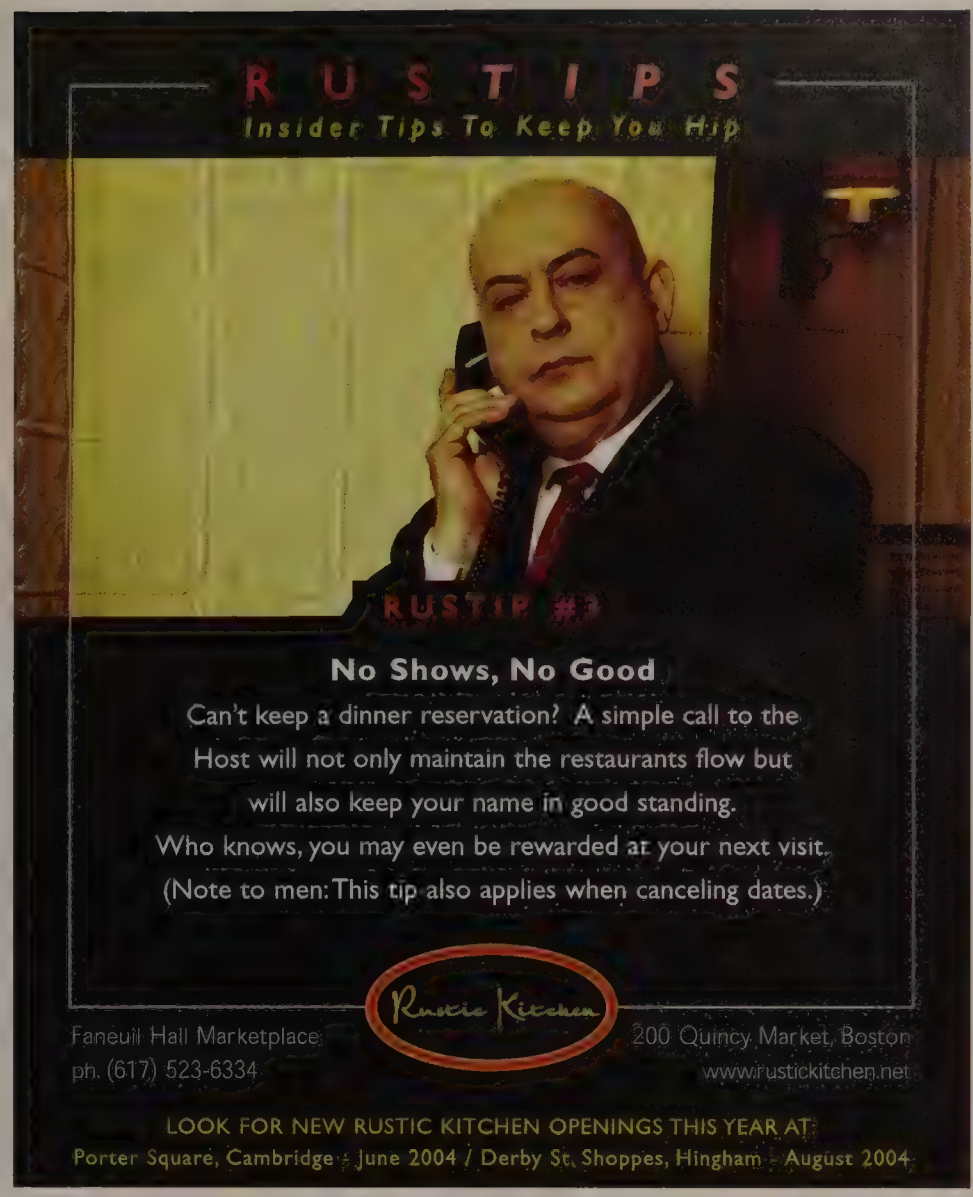
BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

Michael Schlow's new program is a go, pending the dough.

As chef Michael Schlow rearranged his busy schedule to serve as host of a public television show called The Bread Also Rises, it seemed the "go" light couldn't have been any greener. The show's concept embraced culinary technique, bread's role in reflecting and redeveloping American immigrant cultural traditions, and multicultural nuggets of knowledge. (Did you know, for example, that the croissant originated in Vienna, or that one of New York City's most renowned bagel bakers is a native of Thailand?) The fast-paced pilot, featuring Irish brown bread from Green Hills Bakery in Dorchester, was a hit. Co-producers Arnie Reisman and Lorie Conway had mapped out trips around the country and lined up guests such as renowned author Peter Reinhart, whose baking is part of his spiritual journey. Most important, funding for the 10-part series was being provided by a well-known bakery chain.

Suddenly, the company withdrew its support, as if whisking a tablecloth out from under a carefully arranged buffet, leaving the loaves in limbo. "My feeling is it's still going to happen," says Reisman, who dismisses any notion of an anti-carb conspiracy: "Sales of doughnuts are going through the roof," he observes. And he's eager to quote Michael Romano, chef at New York's Union Square Grill: "Atkins is dead; long live bread!"

SECOND COURSE



Trading spices: In yet another sign that Indian food has transcended its Boston beginnings as ethnic cheap eats, the owners of Kebab-N-Kurry have closed what was one of the city's first Indian restaurants to focus on their more recent, upscale enterprises, including Curry Leaf and Masala Art.

In the South End, Icarus is apparently re-energized after celebrating its 25th year in business. Two new options start this month: Every Monday night, Icarus chef de cuisine Ron Abell will prepare an ad hoc $35 prix fixe menu, available with or without a reservation. And on the second Monday of each month, Icarus will host a wine-and-cheese "tutorial"—three wines, three cheeses—featuring South End Formaggio cheesemonger Tim Bucciarelli and wine from Classic Wine Imports. Meanwhile, chef/owner Chris Douglass holds the fort in the kitchen, creating new dishes such as grilled sea bass with brandade de morue and blood oranges.

The Harvard Square Legal Sea Foods is testing new waters with an à la carte brunch menu on Saturdays and Sundays. If it's a hit, you can expect the other Legals to eventually offer the likes of omelets stuffed with lobster, goat cheese and chives; poached eggs Oscar with crabmeat, asparagus and hollandaise; and three-ounce "sampler sizes" of a variety of champagne cocktails. First Course

We've never been known to turn down a good ol' pig in a blanket, but given the cast of A-list chefs participating, we're pretty sure that former king of the finger foods won't make the cut at Hors d'Oeuvre Fest. Icarus hosts the sampling of amuses bouche April 25 to benefit the Chefs Collaborative, a group of gourmets dedicated to developing sustainable food options and environmentally sound purchasing strategies. Among the cooks in the kitchen are Douglas Organ of Arbor, Jim Solomon of the Fireplace, Ana Sortun of Oleana, Barbara Lynch of No. 9 Park, and others. Mix and mingle with the chefs themselves while grazing the trays of savories—from spoonfuls of ceviche to beef tartare—and take home a door prize or two. Icarus, 3 Appleton St., Boston (617-236-5200). 6 pm. $30 ($25 in advance).

Art: Full Bloom

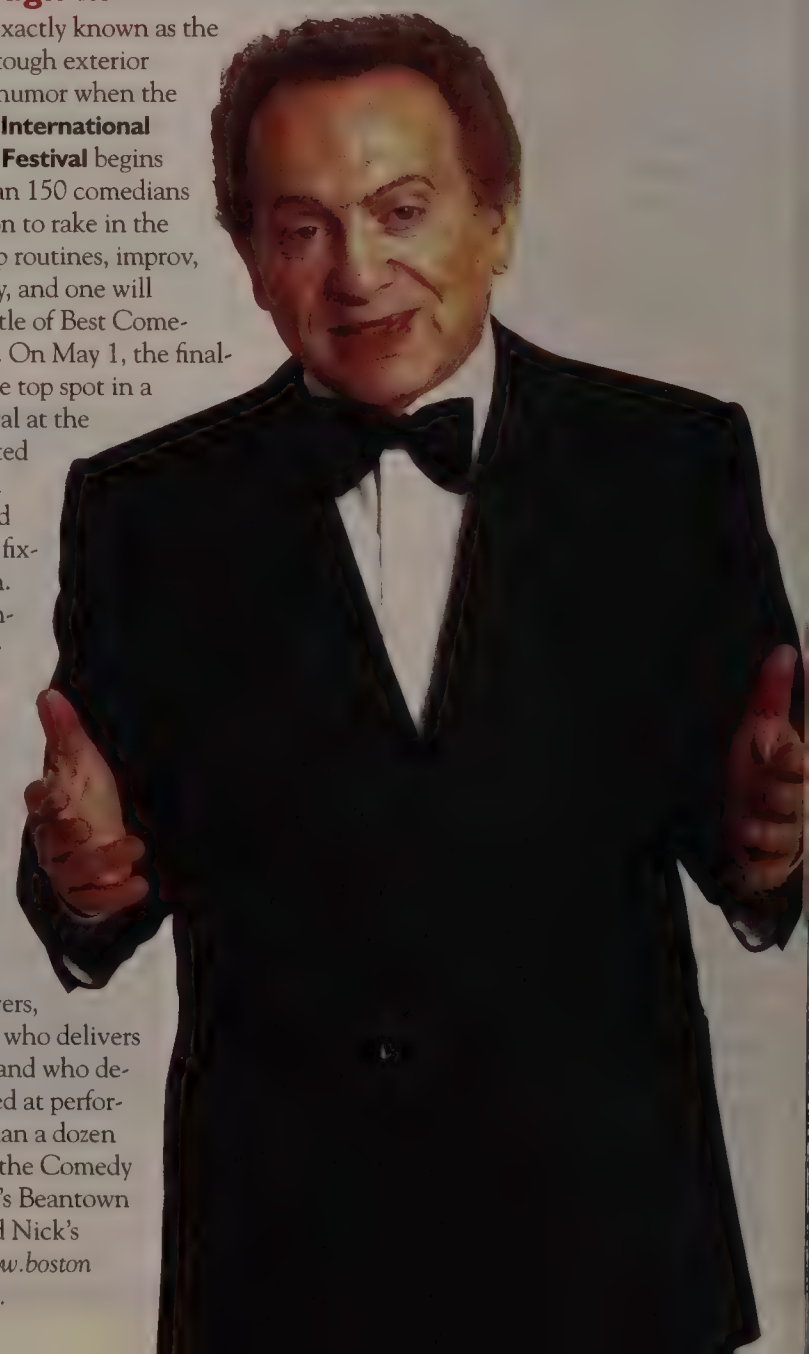
April showers bring flowers a little early this year at the Museum of Fine Arts' 28th annual Art in Bloom event. Since 1976, volunteers from the MFA Associates organization have welcomed experts from the floral industry to sow their creative seeds in the galleries. This year, more than 60 New England garden clubs fuse foliage and artistic expression to create floral interpretations of nearly 80 works on display at the MFA, including Claude Monet's famous painting Water Lilies. The three-day exhibition has been known to draw more than 20,000 visitors, so if you're interested in attending any of the ticketed events (like a demo by London's Shane Connolly on the 27th or the Sneak Preview party on the 24th), get your tickets soon. Museum of Fine Arts, 465 Huntington Ave., Boston (617-369-3395). $15-$125. www.mfa.org.

SAT./APRIL 17

Music: Bring in the Noise, Bring in the Punk

Loved by the left, scorned by the far left (mainly for the crime of signing up with major record label EMI), the UK's New Model Army have taken a lot of grief over the years. Blessed with a devoted (at times fanatical) following, they've been lumped into categories like "goth," "crusty" and "punk," when all they are, really, is post-punk folk rockers. Now, why is that so hard to understand? Record-shop shelving issues aside, NMA's strength is its ability to create impassioned, anthemic paeans to a world gone awry. Whether putting the old days up on a pedestal or romanticizing today's disenfranchised castaway youth, few do it better and more earnestly than guitarist/singer Justin Sullivan and company. See them and sing along (with everyone else) at the Middle East Upstairs. 472 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-864-3278). $10 advance, $12 doors. 18+.

SUN./APRIL 18



Performing Arts: Playing It Up

If you're like us, you always have the best intentions of seeing a good number of the plays that come to town, but wind up making it to far too few. You can make up for a year's worth of theatrical inactivity in one day at the annual Boston Theater Marathon. It's not for the fainthearted: over 10 hours, 45 new 10-minute plays, each one produced by a different New England theater company, are presented on two stages. Each play is performed twice, and companies taking part include the Commonwealth Shakespeare Company, the Theatre Cooperative, Zeitgeist Stage Company, Boston Theatre Works, Súgán Theatre Company, Huntington Theatre Company and New Repertor Theatre. The craziness starts at noon on Sunday and goes continuously until 10 pm. At 10:30 pm, audience members can join the nearly 100 actors, 40 directors and pla wrights (all of whom will probably be exhausted and very sweaty by this point) for a celebration with food, music and a cash bar. Boston Playwrights' Theatre, 949 Comm. Ave., Boston (617-358-7529). www.bu.edu/bpt. 12-10 pm. $30.

Comedy: Laugh In

Our fair city isn't exactly known as the friendliest, but its tough exterior gives way to good humor when the seven-day Boston International Comedy & Movie Festival begins April 25. More than 150 comedians converge on Boston to rake in the laughs via stand-up routines, improv, and sketch comedy, and one will emerge with the title of Best Comedian—and $7,000. On May 1, the finalists compete for the top spot in a comedic battle royal at the finale gala, co-hosted by local funnyman Steve Sweeney and Hollywood Squares fixture Tom Bergeron. Other festival highlights include one-man (or -woman) shows by comic bad boy Jackie Mason (pictured), at the Orpheum, and fashion maven/plastic surgery advocate (and BICMF lifetime achievement honoree) Joan Rivers, at the Wilbur. See who delivers a good punchline and who deserves to be heckled at performances at more than a dozen venues, including the Comedy Connection, Dick's Beantown Comedy Vault and Nick's Comedy Stop. www.bostoncomedyfestival.com.

Ondekoza drummers warm up by running the marathon

Most runners collapse with a sense of exhausted accomplishment as they reach the Copley Square finish line of the Boston Marathon. But for the Japanese runners of the musical group Ondekoza, the race is just a warmup. Immediately after crossing the finish line, the runners will turn into drummers, taking up their sticks and performing in the Japanese Taiko style—wearing only loincloths. (They run in normal running gear, however.)

Ondekoza formed in 1969. The group members live and work out together running and doing weight training in the mornings, reading and doing calligraphy—"to stimulate the right brain," says drummer Takahiro Yoshida, "which governs artistic creativity and instinct"—in the afternoons. The group occasionally retreats to a camp for a week of intensive rehearsals.

The marathon is, incredibly, a fairly short run for the group, which ran the perimeter of the United States between 1990 and 1993, covering nearly 10,000 miles and performing 355 concerts along the way. Their latest plan is to run across China, with completion scheduled in time for the 2008 Beijing Olympics.

The drummers are no slouches musically either, having worked with a variety of collaborators in genres ranging from classical (Seiji Ozawa) to house music music (DJ Jeremy Healy). In addition to the post-Marathon performance Ondekoza plays the preceding Saturday evening at the Copley Theatre, with fellow Japanese musicians the Bamboo Orchestra and jazz shamisen player Hiromitsu Agatsuma. Both appearances are part of the Japan Society of Boston's centennial celebration, which continues all year long with exhibitions, concerts, film series and seminars.

Saturday, April 17 (concert at Copley Theatre), and Monday, April 19 (performance in Copley Square, right after the members complete the race). For tickets to the Saturday performance ($40), call the Japan Society at 617-451-0726. —Keith Powers

O Buford, Where Art Thou?

Walking Tall swings and misses

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Walking Tall is an odd choice for a remake, and the result is an odd remake. The much-sequelized, übervi-olent 1973 original dresses up the real-life exploits of Buford T. Pusser, a one-time pro wrestler who returns to his Tennessee hometown to find it controlled by thugs running illegal casinos and prostitution rings. Pusser, played by the inimitable Joe Don Baker with a nearly continuous "don't mess with me" expression on his face, fights back with a big stick of lumber, gets elected sheriff and almost literally drives the bad guys out of town on the front end of his station wagon.

WWE star The Rock and Jackass' Johnny Knoxville compare scars in Walking Tall

Now, ironies of ironies, you get a remake starring a onetime wrestler, and the hero isn't even ex-grappler Pusser. It's fictional ex-soldier Chris Vaughn. You also get casinos again, at a time when they're no longer entirely illegal (and the one in the movie isn't). And you get the same ultraviolence, when it's not so uncommon anymore (the original was banned in some countries due to its brutality).

The original's unusual violence and its B-movie populism made it stand out. The remake is just another violent action movie and was made by MGM. (The original, which I saw at the old Portland Twin Drive-In as a tyke, was a hit out of left field, an independent movie bankrolled by, surprisingly, Bing Crosby Productions).

For better or worse, the new Walking Tall is simple stuff. You know who's good, you know who's bad, and there's never any doubt. Yet, watching the film, I never felt much urge to pull for Chris (The Rock), who returns to his hometown in Washington state after eight years in the Special Forces. He's expecting to get a job at the sawmill that's been the backbone of the town, and where he thought his dad (John Beasley) still worked. But once he reconnects with his buddy Ray (Johnny Knoxville), he learns that the mill closed when Jay (Neal McDonough), another of their high-school buddies, inherited it, closed it down and greased enough palms to open a casino.

When Chris and Ray accept Jay's invitation to a night of fun at the casino, Chris sees all is not fun and games there. Bartenders are selling drugs, his ex-girlfriend (Ashley Scott) is dancing in a peep-show booth, and the croupier is slipping loaded dice into the game at the craps table. When he sees the last happen, Chris gets into a knock-down, drag-out with the bouncers—and he's the one knocked down and dragged out. Once he's up and around again, he takes a four-by-four of cedar to about half the casino (and half its bouncers). And when the crooked sheriff (Michael Bowen) won't do anything about the men who left him for dead, Chris presses charges, acts as his own lawyer and wins the trial by flashing his scars to the jury.

From there, it's just a hop, skip and a jump to Chris' being elected sheriff, and to big showdowns with Jay's paid thugs and, eventually, with Jay, who has a car salesman's grin permanently etched on his face. Although the police station shootout featuring Jay's armed thugs intentionally plays like over-the-top 1970s action, the one-on-one showdown, like so many movie fights these days, is shot so tightly that it's confusing. If only directors would pull the camera back, and get action choreographers who can let the actors tussle for more than a split-second between every edit, maybe then we'd care more.

The remake's producers must have thought this was the perfect post-9/11 time to give us a character who'll stand up and fight. It might have seemed that way a year ago. But in the wake of the Gulf War II's credibility gap and the excesses of the Patriot Act, a character who gets violent first and asks questions later doesn't make my fist pump in the air. It makes me recoil. When Chris walks into the closed sawmill for his big showdown, you just want to say, "Dude, how about putting the stick down and letting the state police and the courts handle this?" iB

Au Hasard Balthazar ★★★
Balthazar, a donkey, has a spirituality that the h mans in Robert Bresson's often stunning 1966 pa ble, just re-released, can't match. He provides co fort to them and lets them load their burdens him, yet he has no ego, pride or malice. Meanwhi the people in the movie's French farming village f sake Balthazar and make each other's lives mis able. There are occasional hitches in the hum drama, acted by nonprofessionals and first-tim (for instance, the main instigator, a teen troub maker, needs to be much more charismatic for t other people to let him get away with so much). F tingly, the donkey outdoes them all, right to t moving finish. (At Kendall Square.)

Connie and Carla ★★★
Nia Vardalos returns to the big screen with a riff
Billy Wilder's Some Like It Hot that you might c
My Big Fat Drag Queen Wig. Vardalos (who wr the script) and Toni Collette play Chicago lou singers who witness a crime boss murdering an u derling. The hunted women flee to West Hol wood, where they end up impersonating drag que in order to find work in a cabaret. Vardalos and C lette both have a sunny kookiness that gets the co edy over its dependence on stereotypes (there's lit variety among the overemotional gay men th meet). And while it may be easy to dismiss the pa
"gays are people too" sentiment, following the ha debate over gay marriage, the sentiment see pretty timely, after all. (At Boston Common, Fe way and suburbs.)

Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind ★★
The latest mindbender written by Charlie Ka man (Being John Malkovich, Human Nature, Ad tation) is, as always, like an M.C. Escher drawi in which you can't tell always tell which directi things are headed, but you put your faith in t hope that Kaufman will still get his characters an interesting place. This time, the story abou couple (Jim Carrey, Kate Winslet) who've h their memories wiped of a fizzled relationship b try to rekindle their romantic spark fails to rew that faith. Kaufman bats around interesting id about the struggle between science and hum urges, but despite the appealing chemistry b tween the stars, the ride isn't nearly as involvi amusing, layered or cohesive as the metaphysi journeys in Malkovich or Adaptation. (At Bost Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Girl Next Door ★★
Emile Hirsch plays the teen Everyboy well, Elis
Cuthbert is whistle-worthy and Timothy Olypha shows more life than he ever has before. Still, thi a merely decent (and flagrant) Risky Business kno

Tom Cruise, Rebecca DeMornay and Joe Pantolia roles. Hirsch plays a smart senior; the naughty b he fancies (Cuthbert) is a porn star trying to get of the business and Olyphant plays her boss, w wants her horizontal on the set again. It's not easy to connect the knockoff's dots but, to its cre the film remains watchable. (At Boston Comm Fenway and suburbs.)

Good Bye Lenin! ★★½
A loyal East German goes into a coma just bef the Berlin Wall falls, and when she has to lea stress-free life after she comes to, her son goes great lengths to make sure she never learns that Communist country doesn't exist anymore. T great premise yields some amusing moments, also some disappointing ones. Unlike in B Wilder's brilliant One, Two, Three (which cove similar territory after the wall went up), the com here never quite hits high gear because the st tempers that comedy with shades of drama. But characters' family drama never becomes as me rable as the premise. (At Kendall Square Coolidge Corner.)

Hidalgo ★★★
It's not the most ambitious movie, but this 1890 adventure earns a lot of goodwill for its old-sch desire to please the average moviegoer, and not a narrow demographic segment. This tale of American Pony Express rider who enters a pre gious long-distance horse race in the Arab Peninsula with his trusty mustang is a small bre
of fresh air. With an unassuming and appeal Viggo Mortensen as its hero, the movie packs in Saturday-matinee exotic entertainment of The S pion King, though it doesn't shoot for humo often. And it conveys a bond between man should be taken with a big grain of salt, since it turns out hero Frank T. Hopkins may have told a tall tale or two in his day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Intermission ★★★
Think of it as an Irish version of Scotland's Trainspotting. Sex, drugs and rockin' crime are the main sparks to this comedy, which lights on fire when one foolish Dubliner (Cillian Murphy of 28 Days Later) dumps his dishy girlfriend (Kelly Macdonald of Trainspotting) "as a test," and she promptly hooks up with a married man (Michael McElhatton). This dubious act causes a ripple effect that spills into the lives of the married man's wife (Deirdre O'Kane), a surly bus driver (Brian F. O'Byrne), a macho cop dying to be a celebrity (Colm Meaney) and even an out-of-control thief (Colin Farrell). The movie is never as wild again as it is in its opening scene, so there's a steady petering, but the dark comedy usually connects, and it never totally runs out of momentum. (At Copley Place, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Jersey Girl ★★
Ben Affleck turns in a strong performance as a Manhattan publicist whose wife dies in childbirth, and who soon thereafter loses his job for badmouthing a client and ends up back at his dad's in New Jersey. Affleck and Raquel Castro, as his daughter, have a playful chemistry, and the performances make up for some of the weaknesses in writer-director Kevin Smith's script. But despite oddly appealing touches, (Affleck, Liv Tyler and Castro sing a song from Sweeney Todd at the girl's school variety show), the action often defaults to the most generic touches, like including bland Fleetwood Mac or Springsteen songs at "emotional" moments. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Johnson Family Vacation ★★
More power to Cedric the Entertainer, who headlines his first comedy here. But this knockoff of National Lampoon's Vacation—this time about a black Los Angeles family struggling to make it to a Missouri family reunion—strains to generate laughs. The only sustained amusement comes in the two stretches when Cedric and his fellow Original Kings of Comedy vet Steve Harvey face off as two grown brothers who are still as competitive (and childish) as they were at age 10. (Opens April 7 at Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Ladykillers ★★★
The Coen brothers' latest is as much a companion piece to their O Brother, Where Art Thou? as it is to the Alec Guinness English comedy it remakes. In transplanting to the Deep South the tale of robbers masquerading as musicians, the Coens have given it some of the down-home feel of O Brother, using gospel music here as they did bluegrass in that film. Tom Hanks, who plays more of a character role here as a highfalutin' Southern intellectual trying to rob a casino, isn't George Clooney funny here, but the irrepressible Irma P. Hall, as the God-fearing landlady who finds out what the Poe-quoting intellectual is up to, just about makes up for it. (At Loews Boston Common, AMC Fenway and suburbs.)

The Passion of the Christ ★½
What's more creepy—to watch a man beaten to a literal pulp for half of Mel Gibson's Jesus movie or to realize that the movie is more about Christ's scars than his teachings? It's a toss-up, but they're the sort of things that keep the movie from being genuinely dramatic (the cheesy slo-mo moments don't help, either). You have to admire Gibson as a producer for doing it his way—on his own nickel, in subtitled Aramaic and Latin. But as a director he gets little across except violence, right up to the money shot of blood squirting from Jesus' hands as they're nailed to the cross. Also, this is the Lord of the Rings/Harry Potter Bible movie: if you haven't read the book three times, it's not going to fill in any of the details for you. Consequently, most of the potentially "controversial" elements are too murky to change a general audience's views on anything, since the relationships between the Jews and the Romans and between Jesus and the Jewish leaders remain unclear. In fact, if you're just an average moviegoer who can't quote scripture but is just looking for a good story, this plodding ode to martyrdom was not made for you. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Spartan ★★★
It looks as if David Mamet has settled into making thrillers with interesting premises and credibility-challenging twists and turns. Partially filmed in Boston, this story about the abduction of the president's daughter has its occasional stumbling blocks, like the plot's dependence on several calls being made to a pay phone. (How many pay phones take incoming calls anymore?) But it holds up better than Mamet's last film, 2001's Heist, because of unorthodox touches like its intimate focus on the Secret Service and covert ops specialists working on getting the girl back. Val Kilmer plays one of these specialists, a self-described "worker bee" who's forced to think beyond military protocol once he realizes the cynical politics behind the situation. As with the pay phones, there are several leaps of faith you just have to take—jumps that you wouldn't make for a less interesting movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Starsky & Hutch ★★★
I never had any desire to see Starsky & Hutch on TV. But with Ben Stiller and Owen Wilson in the title roles and the action played intentionally for laughs, I was there. And I was rewarded. The two stars bring just the right daffy charm to the buddy-cops—one intense, the other laid-back—as the partners go after a smug cocaine kingpin (Vince Vaughn). You get Tab, muscle cars, afros, Jewfros, tube socks, disco, freedom rock, Rhoda head scarves and other 1970s cheese while S & H prowl the mean streets of Bay City with the help of Huggy Bear (Snoop Dogg). Think of The Brady Bunch Movie with guns. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Taking Lives ★★
Angelina Jolie's latest is a half-decent, Seven-style tale about the search for a serial killer—until its strained final half-hour. She plays an FBI agent specializing in profiling serial killers who is asked to come up to Montreal to help police there solve a series of grisly murders. This thriller never gets too intense, but then again it never gets too gimmicky either, until that final half-hour, in which the story turns to a glaringly obvious plot twist. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The United States of Leland ★★
A tedious post–American Beauty mire of suburban misery, produced by and co-starring that movie's Kevin Spacey. This one is about an oddball teen (Ryan Gosling) who, for no apparent reason, kills the retarded brother of his ex-girlfriend (Jena Malone). Writer-director Matthew Ryan Hoge casts his net wide and offers a boatload of flawed characters—like Spacey in his "smug" mode as the killer's arrogant author dad—but he doesn't come back with much. It's hard to see what the point of it all is, besides getting a numb butt. The movie's mistake-ridden humanity, including Don Cheadle's juvie-hall teacher who is sympathetic toward the teen, simply doesn't coalesce. For what it's worth, most of the actors cast to play teens (Gosling, Chris Klein and Michelle Williams) are noticeably too old for their parts. (Opens April 9 at Harvard Square, Copley Place and Waltham Embassy.)

Force of nature

Sleater-Kinney broadens its world of punk rock and politics

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Activism wasn't foreign to Sleater-Kinney when the punk trio sprang from the Pacific Northwest in the mid 1990s, partly inspired by the feminist "riot grrrl" scene.

"Women were playing the drums and being in bands, and it was very much not like you're just the girlfriend of the guy in the rock band," singer-guitarist Corin Tucker says of that scene, which was big in Olympia, Wash., where her group began. "Really exciting discussions went on about feminist ideas, and translating those thoughts into a language that was palatable for teenage girls."

Punk trio Sleater-Kinney (from left, Janet Weiss, Carrie Brownstein, Corin Tucker) plays the Roxy.

"These women read pretty sophisticated books by feminist authors, but then, in the art we made, it was turned into music, fanzines and films that were hip and cutting edge," she says. "It was taking textbooks out of a stuffy shelf and turning them into something that people could get excited about."

Certainly people could get excited about Sleater-Kinney. The trio, completed by guitarist-singer Carrie Brownstein and drummer Janet Weiss, blossomed into a tornado, with taut, angular music backing Tucker's bold voice of vibrato and bravado. "I wanted to sing in a way that would stand out and grab people's attention," she says.

But in terms of activism as well as music, Sleater-Kinney broadened its vision on its latest record, 2002's acclaimed One Beat. In addition to well-placed keyboards, strings and horns to supplement the band's twin guitars and drums, that CD reflected post–9/11 emotions in co-written songs such as "Far Away" and "Combat Rock," with its line "Since when is skepticism un-American?"

"I really write from instinct more than anything else," Tucker says from her home in Portland, Ore. "I feel like the songs tell me what they're about, and I have to just respond to that. And that was so clear after 9/11."

The band's performances have been equally incendiary, evidenced last summer by a bracing set at the Tweeter Center in support of Pearl Jam, which also brought the trio out for feisty encores of "Fortunate Son" and "Rockin' in the Free World" that led to a curfew battle with the promoter. But that was nothing compared with the liberal tour's political fallout.

"Going on tour with Pearl Jam right when the war on Iraq happened was intense," Tucker says. "Our first show was in Denver, which, unbeknownst to me, was a huge military audience. So I get up there before anybody and start spouting off about the war, and got booed by 15,000 people.

"Debate has opened up in the past year, and that's been really great," she adds. "The climate right after 9/11 was extremely binding and suffocating in terms of things you couldn't even talk about in public, and that's been true at times during these past four years. But there is a strange sense of hope now, hope that Bush is going to get voted out of office."

Expect more political sparks—and some new songs—when Sleater-Kinney plays the Roxy April 25. "That's our forte, our live show," Tucker says, "and we're really looking forward to getting back and being able to do that.

"This administration has been really frustrating, and I'm sure that will be reflected on the next record," she says, noting the group hopes to hit the studio this fall, but is dealing with writer's block. "We've gotten stuck, and I don't really want to force something like that."

After four CDs on the Olympia-based Kill Rock Stars, the band also isn't sure how it will release its next album, though Tucker says she doubts they would shift to a major label. "All the downloading stuff really has hurt record labels, and it's hurt a lot of indie labels," she says. "There are some places we could go, but it's just finding the right fit for us, 'cause we like to do our own thing."

The delay stands in contrast to her preference for getting things done. "As I get older, I really feel like there's no time to waste," says Tucker, 31. "I'm speaking out against things. I don't think that any of us in the band see ourselves as politicians or even sophisticated politically. But we draw inspiration from bands that talked about politics in a really artistic way like the Clash, which was a huge influence to us."

Tucker says her father helped chart her course. "He really brought me up to debate things," she says. "He's a critical thinker—and had really good taste in music. I stole his Clash records. But he also played Woody Guthrie."

Now she's the parent of a toddler. "Being a new parent, I don't think anything else can make you more political and aware and less cynical," Tucker says. "You really want the country that they grow up in to be the best it can be." iB

The Other Bay Area

An outstanding hip-hop collective brings Left Coast flair to the Bay State

Lyrics Born and the Gift of Gab perform April 15.

A lot has changed in the world of hip-hop since the mid 1990s. Back then, mentioning words like "turntablism" and "trip-hop" in a conversation would have gotten you a confused look. Techno was still called dance music and was pretty much limited to clubs and raves. But one element that has remained constant is the innovative excellence of the music resonating from the San Francisco Bay–area crew known as Quannum Projects.

For better or worse, Quannum's ever-shifting line-up of artists can be hard to follow. There's producer Chief Xcel and MC the Gift of Gab, collectively known as Blackalicious. Then there's Latyrx, the dynamic pairing of the MCs Lateef the Truth Speaker and Lyrics Born. Portland, Ore.'s the Lifesavas are a recent addition to the stable as well. Songstress Joyo Velarde has lent her feminine touch to all of these artists' music over the years, in addition to releasing a single of her own. The above-mentioned acts, along with DJ Shadow, all perform when the Quannum Tour 2004 hits Avalon on April 15.

It was DJ Shadow who brought Quannum to prominence when he released the classic Endtroducing, a brilliant instrumental album of atmospheric hip-hop beats and soundscapes that many say singlehandedly created the genre known as trip-hop (though Shadow himself reportedly hates the term). Alongside this musical trailblazer were his cohorts, making music just as distinctive and creative in its own right.

Seasoned vets, the Quannum crew has been together for more than 10 years now, producing work that stands head-and-shoulders above most of the mainstream and independent rap game these days. Their familiarity with one another gives them a flexibility and a versatility when trading verses and layering their flows atop and alongside one another's that's virtually unmatched. The Latyrx album is a brilliant example of this, as the two MCs evoke a sense of what Run-DMC might have sounded like had they emerged from the more laconic California environment. Lyrics Born's verses range from introspective melancholy (without getting maudlin or self-indulgent, a rare skill these days) to straight-up party raps, while Gab's rhymes are always upbeat and bouncy, even when he's sharply critical.

The cherry on top of all this aural obsession is that the Quannum crew has never put out an album you'd be embarrassed to play in front of your mother. You won't find any bitches or ho's on this label or tales of bedroom conquests. You will, however, find great tracks like Latyrx's "Lady Don't Tek No," which, while taking the opposite approach, is as memorable as anything 50 Cent or the 2 Live Crew ever wrote about the fairer sex.
April 15, Avalon, 15 Lansdowne St., Boston (617-423-NEXT). $25. 18 and older.

Our goal is raise $1,000,000 by December 2004.

Thank you for your support and helping us make a difference.

LESLIE'S LINKS was founded in 1999 by Leslie Semonian who battled cancer and passed away in December of 1999 at the age of 32. During the eight and a half year period of her illness, until her death, Leslie never allowed cancer to stand in the way of her goal of helping others. She knew how precious life was and energetically embraced each day. She helped others to appreciate their own lives more. She wanted to be remembered as a participant in life, not an observer. Her passion was boundless, and will continue in the hearts of the many friends and people whom she inspired.

Leslie's Links is a fund at the Dana Farber Cancer Institute which raises money for Ewings Sarcoma Cancer Research in various ways. One of which is through the Leslie's Links bike team associated with the 192-mile Pan-Mass Challenge bike-a-thon from Sturbridge to Provincetown. Leslie's Links has raised over $700,000 since its inception in 1999.

Please join our hosts for the evening to support a great cause:

I Spy You

I was walking down Newbury Street last week when I nonchalantly noticed you while passing by 29 Newbury, one my local favorite spots. I noticed you sitting in the window enjoying a nice Saturday lunch with another attractive "friend?" I don't normally do this but I found you to be absolutely gorgeous and so, of course, I was compelled to stare at you. I was the curly-haired, punky guy with a slender, fit build wearing a yellow t-shirt with brown stripes and jeans. I was accompanied by my curly red-headed friend dressed in all black. Our eyes met for a brief moment as my friend and I checked out the menu board (and you). I noticed you stumble in the conversation you were having with your companion and then you smiled at me. I really felt that there was a connection between us during that moment and I should have gone into the restaurant and introduced myself, but I was too nervous. Here is my second shot—e-mail me if you want to get together for a good time, a fab friendship or just to talk.

—Newburywindowwatcher@hotmail.com

I Blessed You

You sneezed and I said bless you. But that wasn't the first time I noticed you. I had been checking you out since the moment my group sat down next to yours at Sarsfield's Pub in Quincy, Sunday night after the parade. You introduced yourself to me as I was passing by and it was the friendliest, warmest handshake I've had in a while. You said you wanted to take me out in town because you hang out there a lot. For some reason, numbers were not exchanged—I'm blaming it on the haziness brought on by some pub brew. E-mail me, tell me your name and mine so I know it's you and not some desperate weirdo, and let's maybe move it up a notch from a handshake. Wink, wink.

Symphony Whole Foods Girls

If 24 rolls + 24 rolls = 48 rolls, then how many rolls of toilet paper did the "silly" girls have to lose on their way through Whole Foods to end up with 44 rolls?

Life Is Too Short... I'm So Sorry

I realized this yesterday, March 24, around 8:30 am, at the Au Bon Pain on Boylston Street, when I heard a loud thud and saw a man in his early 50s lying on the floor. His hands turned white, his breathing became labored, and I stood there helpless as the paramedics were called and people took turns frantically debating on whether or not to turn him over or give him CPR or not do anything. I left as the paramedics were coming because I couldn't stand to watch anymore and I felt as if the man would have been humiliated knowing there were people crowding around him. This morning I went back and checked to see how he made out and was told the man died at Mass. General. My thoughts were with him all night, and are now with his family. I'm sorry for your loss and I'm sorry I couldn't help.

The Vinatieri Kick

You said I gave you the Adam V. Boot and I said you held the ball while I kicked it. So appropriate on the day it was, don't you think? The kick ended up being a field goal, and since I am the best personal trainer that you know, maybe you should take my suggestions. Who knows—you may score a touchdown!

Blue Line Encounter

It was the afternoon of the celebratory parade for the Pats' Super Bowl win. I was with some friends and I saw you standing by the door softly smiling to yourself. You had red hair and a black choker with a brown jacket. I tried to continue my conversation with my friends, but my eyes kept leading me back to your smile, which seemed to brighten once you noticed me looking at you. Once we got to the end of the line, you asked me what time it was—it was just before 3 pm. My friends began to exit the train, but the doors shut on us briefly, trapping us momentarily—creating what I thought to be a situation to crack a corny joke. I hoped you hadn't taken it the wrong way. You went up the stairs and my friends and I took a cab. I've occasionally looked around hoping to see you again to ask your name, but considering the nature of the day, I don't even know if you're from the area. So, if you see this, let me know if we can get caught again sometime.

Red Line, Pastry and Dickens

You were coming from the North End and were carrying cannoli from Modern Pastry. I was reading a book on the Red Line to Harvard. It was a Thursday around 7:30. If I hadn't slid over to give you a place to stand, I would have lost my place in the book anyway when I caught your smile. Write if you're interested in talking more about Modern vs. Mike's and whether Memoirs of a Geisha is really Dickensian.

The Green Line from Cleveland Circle to Downtown.

It was around 12 pm, March 27. I noticed you around St Paul Street. At Kenmore you sat down next to me. You had a Mediterranean look and were wearing a cream-colored sweatshirt, jeans and brown shoes. You had a nice two-day beard and a great head of hair. I was wearing sweatpants and was heading to the grocery store. I had on a black hat and was playing a game on my phon We both got off at Park Street as the train was taken out of service. You glanced back and I was not sure it was me you were looking at. I really wanted to say hello but didn't due to my scruffy look. If you remember this, e-mail me. I would love to have a drink with you soon.

Bowie

You are the very attractive Asian woman who was selling a floor seat to the David Bowie concert March 30 outside the FleetCenter. Another woma was trying really hard to help you. I was the guy with brown hair and a leather jacket. We talked, but I didn't want to make a low offer. It was great to see that you got it sold. I'd love to hear what you thought of the show. C I buy you a cup of coffee sometime?

Our eyes met across a sea of people at a place we weren't supposed to b Your smile, eyes, or something I found invigorating. The first dinner and the chase back to my place, wa the tide in the ocean of our relationship. We covered this count coast to coast, event to event. Your scent, your touch, your presence is intoxicating. You are my drug and I am going through withdrawal. Together we were one, apart I am none. Best friends forever, when dic "I love you" lose meaning? You wer the water that nurtured my mind, body and soul. At least we'll have t cannoli dance, or one day we'll mee up to do the hanky-panky. rockie horoscope

APRIL 14 – 27, 2004

ARIES MARCH 20-APRIL 19

Let it go. This is a good time to get out from under the habits that you always wind up regretting. You know, the behavior that sabotages your best intentions and sends significant others running for cover. While the supportive trine between the Aries sun and rehabilitative Pluto is at peak strength, the healing process can occur on various levels—conscious, unconscious, even cellular. Write your memoirs, speak your piece when the sun and retrograde Mercury meet on the 16th and you're at your expressive best.

TAURUS

APRIL 20–MAY 20

Good faith and good luck are inexorably joined now, so you can't fool around—you've got to be true to yourself. You should also try to separate fantasy from, if not a soon-to-be historical fact, then something akin to a long-term life goal—preferably nothing that smacks of sainthood or a star on your boulevard of choice. While visions of being inducted into a hallowed Hall of Fame can inspire good work, perhaps the best you've done to date, its production may cost a small fortune. Are you overly optimistic and enthusiastic, and over budget?

GEMINI

MAY 21–JUNE 20

While your Mercury ruler is retrograde (until the 30th) you shouldn't even try to make travel plans; however, you can do extensive research on the arts and religions of the future destination. Right now, faith could be a strong motivating force, whether it's riding on your team's prospects for the season or your expectations for a romantic fling. Pay marked attention to what you hear or read around the 16th, when Mercury and the sun join forces. The info could change your opinion about an organization you're attached to, a cause that you support.

CANCER

JUNE 21–JULY 22

Take it easy. High expectations can lead to a meltdown; ditto if you blindly trust that your luck will bail you out. And don't for a minute consider throwing caution to the wind. Simply remind yourself that whenever pleasure-loving Venus and munificent Jupiter present a situation that appears to be "too much of a good thing," moderation should be your primary m.o. This way, you won't max out the credit cards or eat your way through an entire dessert tray. Sweetness becomes cloying and generosity turns into wretched excess until the new-moon/solar eclipse on the 19th.

LEO

JULY 23–AUGUST 22

Prepare to embrace the next turning point in your life, the moment when you commit to change. Maybe you'll meet your ultimate mind-body teacher; maybe you'll check out an unfamiliar religion, maybe you'll read a book. It might not be enlightenment, per se, but while your powerful sun ruler and rehabilitative Pluto trine, some sort of light flicks on. The cuspy solar eclipse on the 19th ushers in six months of avid research, questions about the direction of your career and a passion for traveling purely for pleasure.

VIRGO

AUGUST 23–SEPTEMBER 22

Nobody is pulling the rug out from under you. However, significant others could suddenly change their minds and throw you for a loop. They might also come up with an impressive song-and-dance routine concerning your career and family. Even if the prospects look as good as the promises, you're likely to be nervous about any sort of change. Pay attention to the ideas that pop into your head when your Mercury ruler and the daring Aries sun merge around the 16th. They can show you how to use shared resources to further your own interests.

LIBRA

SEPTEMBER 23–OCTOBER 22

Taking your good fortune for granted might be an invitation for disappointment, not disaster. Please don't exaggerate a problem and turn it into dire circumstances when blow-it-out-of-proportion Jupiter challenges your amenable Venus ruler on the 14th. Perhaps you'll contribute more than you should to an organization you admire, a friendship you value. Maybe you won't get what you think you're entitled to. Careful, entitlement and resentment are issues a fair-minded Libra will obsess over. Let 'em go.

SCORPIO

OCTOBER 23–NOVEMBER 21

Pisces and Aquarius people play a big part in this week's Scorpio scenario. They're the signs who are appealing to your spirituality and supporting your talent. Encourage them to continue. The folks who might offer up more resistance than you expect are Gemini and Sagittarius, signs that, rather than argue, usually accept or adjust to your demands. Not everything, however, is topsy-turvy. You can rely on a co-worker or health professional to provide the ideas, facts and figures you'll need during the next six months.

SAGITTARIUS

NOVEMBER 22–DECEMBER 21

Like Leo and Aries, you're being blessed with a healing force so powerful yet so subtle you might not realize what's taking place. Here it is: Redemptive Pluto in Sag is receiving positive rays from the Aries sun in your house of creativity and pure, no-strings-attached love. And while there's an element of risk involved—Aries is nothing if not daring—the benefits far outweigh the dangers. Except around the 24th, when aggressive Mars in your Gemini house of partners challenges the validity of Pluto's comeback. Relapse?

CAPRICORN

DECEMBER 22–JANUARY 20

While it might not be completely smooth sailing ahead, the next few weeks offer no apparent problems. Sure, you'll continue to fulfill your obligations toward a significant other, and you might have to take over some of their responsibilities. But that's an easy load for most Goats to carry. Those born near the Aquarius cusp could be affected by the solar eclipse on the 19th, but since Mercury is retrograde in your house of the family tree and real estate, there's not much you can do to forestall problems in that area. Have patience and perseverance.

AQUARIUS

JANUARY 21–FEBRUARY 18

Who loves you, baby? Just about anyone with a spark of curiosity in them. Especially Aries, Scorpio and Gemini natives, guys and girls who wanna have fun. And while someday you may have to pay—by forfeiting a friendship?—to play, sooner or later jealous types tend to get over their bouts with the green-eyed monster. No harm, no foul, no material gain, either. However, your spiritual and artistic stock can rise dramatically next week when appreciative Venus favors imaginative Neptune in your sign. Enter the Pisces.

PISCES

FEBRUARY 19–MARCH 19

While you may feel energized (some call it infuriated) by the attention you're receiving from a sibling or neighbor, the interaction can also reinforce your high-flying idealism. Holier-than-thou is a nice place to visit when the occasion demands it; so while first Mars, then Venus supports your Neptune ruler, feel free to adopt whatever sanctimonious or saintly approach suits you. These are also highly productive artistic periods, especially for fixing up the house and garden. Angels, please; no gnomes.

The Improper Bostonian's Dating in Boston issue will take a look at the intricacies of wooing. One vital ingredient to the perfect date is the right venue to sit, share a meal and have quiet conversation. The Improper will tell you about some of the best places to go in Boston when you want to have an intimate dinner with that special someone. In addition, local author and legendary coquet Steve Almond will muse on the age-old art of flirting. And finally, on the flip side of courtship, breakups are a part of everyone's life. Susan Abbattista shares her own experiences with ill-fated relationships and talks with Bostonians who have survived the heartache.

NO NURSING ON THE DANCE FLOOR...

The Anti-Defamation League proved that it's pro–swingin' party with its Young Leadership Celebration, held at the Institute of Contemporary Art.

Seen nibbling sushi and sipping drinks were such attractive and agreeable types as the evening's honorees, Liza Cohen and Gregg Myles Levin; wildly chic patroness of the arts Jennifer Winn; über-philanthropists Douglas and Judi Krupp; black-clad raven-haired beauty Maggie Gold-Seelig and her other half, Jonathan Seelig; the Gatsby-like Jay Gordon; surfer dude and possessor of important hair Adam Berger; attorney-at-large Caesar Belbel; and one woman who seemed to be channeling Mae West when she said to her date, "You can tell your mother that I may be a shiksa, but I put the 'ew' in Jew."

In fact, the evening was rife with witty repartee of a Borscht Belt–meets–Oscar Wilde variety—like the man who said, "I'm hoping to meet a nice Jewish girl," to which his friend replied, "Does it matter that you're not a nice Jewish boy?"

Once the honorees were duly acknowledged and applauded, a DJ swung into action and the party kicked into high gear, with one new mother maneuvering her husband onto the dance floor with the promise, "Just one dance, honey. I swear. I'm lactating, for God's sake."

THEY SAY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY WAS A LAUGH RIOT TOO...

The last time many of us actually attended a poetry reading, it was to impress the English major we were trying to seduce sophomore year, which is a shame, since poetry readings don't have to be dismal affairs in dimly lit coffee houses.

In fact, they can be held in elegant surroundings, complete with cocktails and little nibbly things, which is how the Boston Adult Literacy Fund handled Lift Your Voice: An Evening of Poetry and Music, which took place at the new Ritz-Carlton.

The top-notch talent included such giants of the verse world as Mary Oliver, Kevin Young, and Martìn Espada, who read their own and other poets' work, interspersed with musical interludes by the extremely talented Jubilee Trio.

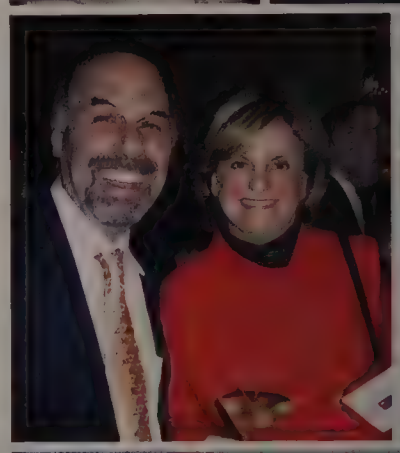
Looking on were such prominent figures as New Yorker poetry editor Alice Quinn, big-hearted Brahmin Rhys Gardiner, WBZ Channel 4 news vixens Peg Rusconi and Lisa Hughes, and one guest who said, "I didn't expect to laugh so much. If any of them decide to give up poetry, they could probably make it as comedians."

TOO BAD THERE WERE NO LEFTOVERS...

Charlie the Tuna should volunteer for Community Servings, or at least get Starkist to be a corporate sponsor of the group's annual Life Savor benefit, since it's an event that not only has good taste but tastes good.



The evening began with a cocktail reception at the Langham Hotel, where everyone was careful to limit the intake of tasty hors d'oeuvres, saving room for the dinner parties that followed at 90 of the city's best restaurants, each one hosted by a different local luminary.

This year's celebrity crop included B-52s frontman Fred Schneider; Hizzonah Tom Menino; Chronicle co-host Mary Richardson and her producer/husband, Stan Leven; WBCN programming behemoth Oedipus; lovable food writer Corby Kummer; Channel 4 entertainmentrix Joyce Kulhawik; the ever-sparkly Hat Sisters; writer and daughter of "Dear Abby" Margo Howard; KISS 108 morning mouth Matt Siegel; and reality TV contestant Brian Glazer, the Average Joe also-ran whose celebrity status is based on the fact that he successfully marketed himself to the American public as a mediocrity. (That said, he seems like a nice guy.)

Among the big kahunas surfing this social wave were the party's co-chairs, tie designer Tony Corey and Caribbean queen Colette Phillips; top restaurateurs like Michela Larson and Mary-Catherine Diebel; the Langham's gallant, Gallic general manager, Serge Denis and his gorgeous wife, Jane; perennial party-goers Lynne and Gary Smith; advertising executive Mike Casey; incorrigible scamp Shawn McBride; white-hot interior decorator Eric Roseff; and a woman who introduced herself to another guest by saying, "I met you here a few years ago. I was masquerading as a drunk."

Following dinner, there was music and dancing in the lobby of One Post Office Square, although many people begged off presumably because more than a few of them had to be back in the neighborhood the next morning, wearing a tie and carrying a briefcase.

THERE'S ALWAYS E-BAY...

Overheard at the Preview Party for the New England Spring Flower Show: A woman who won a raffle prize and then complained to no one in particular, "I live in Harbor Towers! What am I going to do with a composter?" IB

SINGLE IN BOSTON

Does it surprise you that in its annual report on the "Best Cities for Singles," Forbes rated our beloved burg No. 1 in 2002? That's right, Forbes' editors crunched the numbers on the 40 most populated U.S. metro areas, and Boston got the highest combined score for culture, nightlife, number of singles and sheer "buzz," among other criteria—including a "coolness" ranking that I won't even try to explain here.

Our appeal for singles slipped a little in last year's poll, however: We came in third behind Austin and Denver-Boulder. Still not too shabby, though, considering we beat out metro areas like New York, San Francisco and L.A. (Results aren't in yet for '04.)

Despite Forbes' confidence in our city as a hothouse for unmarrieds, many single Bostonians that I know, and IMPROPER readers I've met, would like better love lives. "More stories about dating and being single" is still the most frequent request we get from readers, hence our first-ever dating issue. The story possibilities are infinite, but we've made a start here with four features that range from the practical to the playful. We've even covered one of the hardest parts of dating: breaking up.

UH-OH BOYS

In your recent article "Beauty and the Boys" (April 14), you posed the question: How do Boston women compare? One particular response jumped to my attention. After all, it's hard to ignore it when a man calls every woman in Boston fat and unattractive, with an undeserved attitude. Gregg, 35, I'd like to provide you with some feedback. A woman does not need to be a supermodel to strut. If we have a good day, if we accomplish something positive, if we learned something new, if we just bought a fun new pair of shoes, we can strut. When a woman is strutting "like a 10," she is confident, sure of herself and likely to be more woman than you are ready for—no matter what she looks like or how much she weighs. If you would prefer a done-up New York City girl or an eternally tanned California lady, I think I speak for my fellow female Bostonians when I say: Delta flies direct from Logan to L.A. and the Fung Wah bus leaves on the hour. Can't say we'll miss you.

—SARAH WEBB
Boston

I thoroughly enjoyed the article "Beauty and the Boys" in your last issue, but disagree with what appears to be a common theme in the article: that too many women in Boston wear too much makeup. If anything, I'd hate to be a MAC salesman in this town. Coming from New York, I was amazed that the lesbian population in Boston was so much larger than I had expected. Little did I realize that it was just that there's a huge number of women here who are dedicated to wearing little to no makeup and sensible shoes. Needless to say, I'm ever thankful to be gay.

—L. HEALY

SOCKING SOX FANS

Chris Collins attempts to exorcise the events at the end of last year's Red Sox season through the usual theme of eternal optimism (The Collins Card, April 14). But Boston doesn't deserve a baseball championship.

One evening last year, I headed down the street to a local pub to watch the World Series. When I walked in, I was chagrined to see not baseball but a Celtics exhibition game on all four of the pub's TVs. They grudgingly put the game on one of the TVs, but not one of the pub's patrons—who one week earlier were screaming for the Red Sox—was the slightest bit interested. This scene is typical of the attitude toward sports in this town. The average Boston sports fan lurches through an endless Sox, Patriots, Bruins, Celtics loop in a pathetic attempt to personally connect with a champion while always missing the larger story.

If you're in front of a TV watching sports while the World Series is being played and you're not watching the World Series, then clearly you're not a baseball fan. And if you're not a baseball fan, what real meaning could the Sox winning the baseball championship possibly have? Peel back the layers of a Boston fan and it's all Sox all the way down.

—BRIAN FOX

SUSAN ABBATTISTA

"When the IMPROPER asked me to write an article on surviving a breakup, I was in such a deep funk over my own big breakup that I really didn't think I could do it," says Susan Abbattista, author of "Loves Me...Loves Me Not" on page 28. "But writing the story—getting the messy contents of my head onto the page and talking with other breakup survivors—helped me in ways I didn't expect. I learned that people can carry a great deal of hidden sadness as they go through the motions of their everyday lives, and yet somehow they emerge from those dark days stronger and better than before."

Abbattista, a freelance writer and an editorial director at Cambridge BioMarketing Group, lives in Somerville.

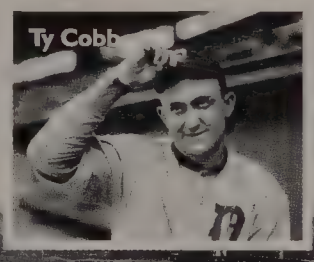
GALLERY SCORES A HIT



Kenmore Square is known more as a subway stop for Fenway and the nearby clubs than as a shopping or dining destination. But businesses are beginning to pop up in the area, as the city improves the sidewalks and roads and the T upgrades Kenmore station.

Some of the additions are taking place in the swanky Hotel Commonwealth, which opened last year but is still getting an interior and exterior makeover. The hotel already houses high-end seafood restaurant, Great Bay, which opened to rave reviews last year. Now, heaps of shops are opening in the hotel—Artemesia Floral Design and used book store Commonwealth Books have set up shop. Coming soon are ice cream slingers Toscanini's, gourmet wine and food shop the Wine Gallery, perfumery Nantucket Natural Oils and jewelry store Persona, LLC.

Linking many of these shops together is the new Panopticon Gallery, a winding row of display cases housing about 70 photographs. The premiere exhibition at the Kenmore Panopticon (there's another one in Waltham) is Home Run: Vintage Baseball Photographs. Visitors can see crisp, black-and-white images of legends like Babe Ruth, Jimmie Foxx, Ty Cobb and others, as well as rare action photos and a panoramic shot of Fenway Park, taken during the 1914 World Series. Most of the images come from rarely seen collections of institutions like the Boston Public Library and the Griffin Museum of Photography. Gallery owner Tony Decaneas explains, "I'm biased toward humanistic art, images that tell stories about the past and present." His concept is to resurrect historical Boston images (from negatives, glass plates and books) and transform them into clear, blown-up images. Exhibition themes will be timely—a show focusing on American politics is set to coincide with the Democratic National Convention in July.

The gallery is also worth checking out for its display of works by Lexington-based luminary Bradford Washburn, who, apart from being an accomplished photographer and a renowned mountaineer was the founding director of the Museum of Science.

NURSERIES

It's spring (well, sort of), the time of year when many of us get inspired to start a garden—or at least get a window box blooming. Here are a few nurseries within a 30-minute drive from Boston that can supply the seeds and green things you need.

- Mahoney's Garden Center opened its original Winchester location in 1959 and now has six other area stores. They carry a wide selection of perennials, shrubs, ground cover, annuals and a line of "Proven Winners"—plants that remain colorful in the local climate. 242 Cambridge St., Winchester (781-729-5900). www.mahoneysgarden.com.
- Wilson Farms has been a local landmark since 1884. Its 37,000-square-foot greenhouse incubates seasonal and perennial plants that you can transfer into your garden. 10 Pleasant St., Lexington (781-862-3900). www.wilsonfarm.com.
- Winston Flowers & Garden's extensive greenhouse garden shop is the picture of Victorian-era gardening. It sells antique garden furniture, and a variety of flowers ready for transplantation. A garden design manager is available for consultations. Route 9 and Florence St., Newton (617-541-1164). www.winstonflowers.com.
- City Farm Florists & Nursery carries seedlings of vegetable plants, expansive bouquets of floral annuals and perennial bulb plants such as Easter lilies. 717 American Legion Highway, Roslindale (617-469-2992). www.cityfarm.com.
- Thayer Nurseries has a big selection of long-blooming, low-maintenance perennials for the novice gardner, as well as echinacea, a pretty pink flower that's better known as an immune-system booster. 270 Hillside St., Milton (617-698-2005). —Julie Babayan

STRONG WOMAN: TRISHA MEILI

To say Trisha Meili is a woman of courage is an understatement. Known only as the Central Park Jogger since her brutal and much publicized attack in 1989, Meili revealed her identity last year with the publication of her best-selling book I Am the Central Park Jogger. Hers is a story of miraculous recovery—relearning how to walk and talk, and coping with permanent brain damage—that has given hope to thousands of head injury and rape survivors and their families and friends. Meili will be in Boston to receive Magic 106.7's Courage Award at its 7th Annual Exceptional Women Awards, May 6 at the Westin Copley Place.

IB: What made you reveal your identity 14 years after the attack?
TM: The real turning point was when I spoke at Spaulding Rehabilitation Hospital in Boston. I was speaking to a group of head injury patients and their families and friends about my recovery. At the end, we were answering questions, and the last one came from a man in the back of the room in a wheelchair. He asked, "Were you ever in a wheelchair?" and I said yes. And he said, "You give me great hope." He said this with such great feeling. I inspired him, but with those words he inspired me. He made me pause and think, "I need to share this story," and after that things just seemed to fall into place.

IB: How has your life changed since going public?
TM: I think the response has been more than I had expected and it's been confirmation that it was the right thing to do. So many different kinds of people have identified with one or another aspect of the story. It's not just rape survivors or those with a head injury, it's all people, because we're all struggling with something. People say, "Thank you so much for sharing this story. You'll never know how many people you've touched." I just hear that over and over again, and it's good for me to hear that as part of my own healing.

IB: What's the most common question or response you get from people who hear your story or audience members who hear you speak?
TM: A lot of times, people—these are the ones who remember when [the attack] happened—say, "I'm just so glad to see that you're well." There's "I prayed for you," and I know that that made a difference. I guess a lot of people will ask, "Were you angry about it?" That's a common thing.

IB: What did you learn from the process of writing the book?
TM: I felt that my recovery was a gift, and I really wanted to share it. What I've learned through the whole process was that my instinct and my intuition was right, that I was right to share it. It's a process of breaking the silence that shrouds sexual assault and disability. People don't like to talk about it. One of the things I learned is that by sharing my story it gave others permission to share their story. It breaks the danger of silence.

IB: Your story is such an inspirational one. Who's been the biggest inspiration in your life during your recovery or after going public?
TM: I've met so many people along the way, and each person has their own uniquely beautiful story. All those stories—it may be a story of a survivor or a caregiver—seeing all these people in different roles really inspires me to say, "Yeah, deep down the human spirit is a strong, powerful, beautiful force."

IB: What's next for you?
TM: I'm really enjoying what I'm doing, and in some ways instead of always looking ahead and saying, "Next there's going to be this and that." I've learned to be in the present and concentrate on what's going on now.

HOT DOUGHNUTS, COLD BEER

Krispy Kreme Doughnuts

Time to Eat the Doughnuts... The legend of Krispy Kreme Doughnuts has at last made its way into downtown Boston. The new store, which opened April 15, is located in the Shops at Prudential Center and open for business 24 hours a day, seven days a week. Looks like the doughnut could give pizza a run for its money in attracting hungry hipsters after the bars close down. The store boasts the traditional Krispy Kreme "Hot Doughnuts Now" sign that alerts customers when doughnuts are fresh, as well as a "doughnut theater" viewing area where you can watch the production line.

Decisions, Decisions... Sam Adams Beer fans already in agreement with the brewery's "always a good decision" slogan, might have a tougher decision to make thanks to the recently introduced Samuel Adams Hefeweizen. The new brew, which hit shelves in February, has a crisp, fruity character that'll likely compete with longtime warm-weather fave Sam Adams Summer Ale as the preferred beverage for a summer day at the game, beach or um...office? (Six-packs generally cost $6.99–$7.99.) Hungry hopheads should also check out a slew of new, beer-infused recipes developed by chef Todd English, available online at www.samadams.com.

Now That's Getting Your Money's Worth... Nowadays, five bucks doesn't go very far. You could drink one beer, eat a large bowl of soup or chew about five packs of gum. Or, you can check out the revamped Paradise Lounge, where every night from 5-8 pm, $4.95 is enough to get you anything on the menu. Yes, anything. "Our front lounge was only for those 21-plus until recently," says general manager Becky Nolan. "But we're trying to appeal to those of all ages with this deal." Starting at 8 pm, you must be 21 to get in, but once the clock hits 10 pm there are more great deals to be had, including a pitcher of beer and a pizza for $8.95, and $1 burgers with an alcoholic beverage. 969 Comm. Ave., Boston (617-562-8814).

Biscotti Bliss... Ever been deeply disappointed by something you ordered at a restaurant? A few years ago, when Belmont's Annette Downing ordered what turned out to be a bland, tooth-breaking biscotti, she took matters into her own hands. Equipped with a updated version of her great-grandmother's recipe, Downing rented out some kitchen space from a local Belmont church and Bella Biscotti was born. Word has spread about Downing's homemade delights, packaged in pretty baskets and tins. You can find her top-selling item, a dozen biscotti presented in a decorative tin ($25), and many others at Gary's Gourmet Chocolate in Watertown, Chocolate Dream and Giordano's in Belmont, or online at www.geoffanddrews.com. (617-489-0651).

History in the Making... Since 1826, the Union Oyster House has been serving some of the area's best seafood. On March 26, the restaurant was designated a National Historic Landmark—fitting since it's the oldest continually running restaurant and oyster bar in the states and is housed in the oldest standing brick building in Boston. Secretary Andrew Card (Bush's chief of staff), was in attendance to present the Milano family, Oyster House owners for 32 years, with a bronze plaque commemorating the designation. "We're deeply honored," said president Joe Milano. "We're the first restaurant to receive this designation, so that uniqueness makes it even more special." — E.H., J.I., & Rich Levine

RED-CARPET FACIALS

G Spa, the most suggestively named spa in town, has followed in the footsteps of the frequent-buyer pioneers. It's introduced a GVIP membership card to help distinguish steady customers from the riffraff. If you're a discriminating Bostonian who never, ever stands in line, you need this. Give G Spa your name, mailing address and e-mail address, and you'll receive a card that gets punched each time you receive a service. When you've purchased 11 treatments, you're entitled to a free service of your choice. (I'd pick the menage-a-spa.) That's not all you get with this (free) VIP option. It also gives you priority booking, which means that when you're in dire need of a last-minute manicure, they'll find a way to squeeze you in—that goes for the notoriously fun events held at the spa too. Members also receive e-mails with special offers, tips and info on trends. Call 617-267-4772 to join the A-list. 35 Newbury St., Boston

IMPROPER SPEAKING

SEEN, OVERHEARD OR OTHERWISE BROUGHT TO OUR ATTENTION

Soon to Be the 6½ Club?... An Impersonal in our March 17 issue has become something of a phenomenon. Eight single women calling themselves the 7½ Club wrote that they wanted to meet some eligible men at Aqua on April 15. Dinean Wolfe, the 7½ Club's organizer, says the night was a success even if none of the women met their future husband: "When we got to Aqua, we already had a few people waiting. Everyone was very supportive and curious to see what these eight girls were all about." Danielle Garofalo, special events coordinator for Boston Billiard Club, saw the Impersonal and has hooked the 7½ Club up with their next venue for Wednesday, May 12—ladies' night at Boston Billiard, appropriately enough. What's next? Stay tuned for a TV appearance.

Bostonian Idol... Looking for your big show-biz break but don't have the cash to move to L.A.? Auditions for the second annual NEXT New England singing competition take place at Virgin Megastore on Mass. Ave. May 6-8, from 2-5 pm. The contest winner, to be decided at a May 27 finale at the Roxy, gets to sing the National Anthem before a Red Sox game this June and could land an agent from Pretty Polly Productions. www.nextnewengland.com

Crunchy... From the same wacky folks who brought you airborne yoga comes "flying Pilates," Crunch's new Pilates poses that can be practiced in your plane seat while en route to Tampa or some other city where people actually bare their stomachs. The instruction cards for the poses are available only on JetBlue, so don't be trying to do Pilates on another airline or the scary Crunch rabbit mascot will come looking for you.

Harvard Rocks...A few months ago, some Harvard students made their mark on the skin-mag industry with the launch of H Bomb. Now, those crazy Cambridge kids are putting their entrepreneurial energy into another industry: A group of students recently started up Veritas Records. According to spokesperson Stacey Proch-Wilson, "A couple of students got together who wanted more exposure for themselves and other musical acts around school." The Ivy League musicians hold a CD-release party May 6 at the Rack for the label's first album, Primum, a compilation of music from six student bands ranging from jazz to hip-hop and rock. www.fas.harvard. edu/~tickets.

Got It?... We knew it was only a matter of time before America's Next Top Model imitators began popping up on all over the place. Looks like Midori's first in line—the Midori It Girl model search stops at News, Sanctuary, Felt, Venu, Ned Devine's, the Palace and the Rack between April 28 and May 8 as part of an eight-city tour. In an apparent Next Top Model/HotOrNot.com hybrid, the contest tour trailer shows up at local clubs, and pretty partygoers are invited on board for a free mini makeover and head shot. Pics are posted on Midori-It-Girl.com, and the public is invited to vote on who's got the look. Once the votes are tallied, the winners from each city compete for a free trip to Manhattan, a photo shoot with a fashion photographer and a "go see" with a top modeling agency. www.midori-it-girl.com.

Tickets, Mastered... No, that scalper outside Fenway isn't shivering because of the cold. He's quaking in fear of the growing popularity of StubHub.com, an online venue through which registered ticket-holders and ticket-seekers nationwide can circumvent shady scalpers and safely buy or resell tickets to sports and entertainment events, by matching up with other registered users. Co-founder (and former Bostonian) Eric Baker says the site eliminates the hassles and letdowns common to other forms of "secondary ticketing" by holding sellers responsible (via their credit card) for selling legit tickets. You can log on and order tickets for events the same day. Baker describes Boston as one of StubHub's "very top markets," thanks largely to its "passionate sports fans." But StubHub's not just for sports enthusiasts: "We've seen people resell tickets for everything—the circus, motorcross, rodeo, Madonna," Baker says. "And Oprah's speaking tour—there's a big secondary market for that. Who knew?" (866-788-2482). www.stubhub.com.

SPUN OUT

The Dad Humor is getting out of control

The last time I was hanging out with my friend Ned, he told me that I have a Dad sense of humor—that despite the fact that I am relatively young, and childless, my jokes are heavily laden with the kind of corny wordplay one expects from a wacky dad. "Not that that's a bad thing," Ned added. "Dads are funny." I tried to refute Ned's Dad Humor theory, but later on that day the following conversation transpired.

Me: "Could I have a sip of your Fresca?"

Heather: "Yes."

Me: "You mean, 'yesca'?"

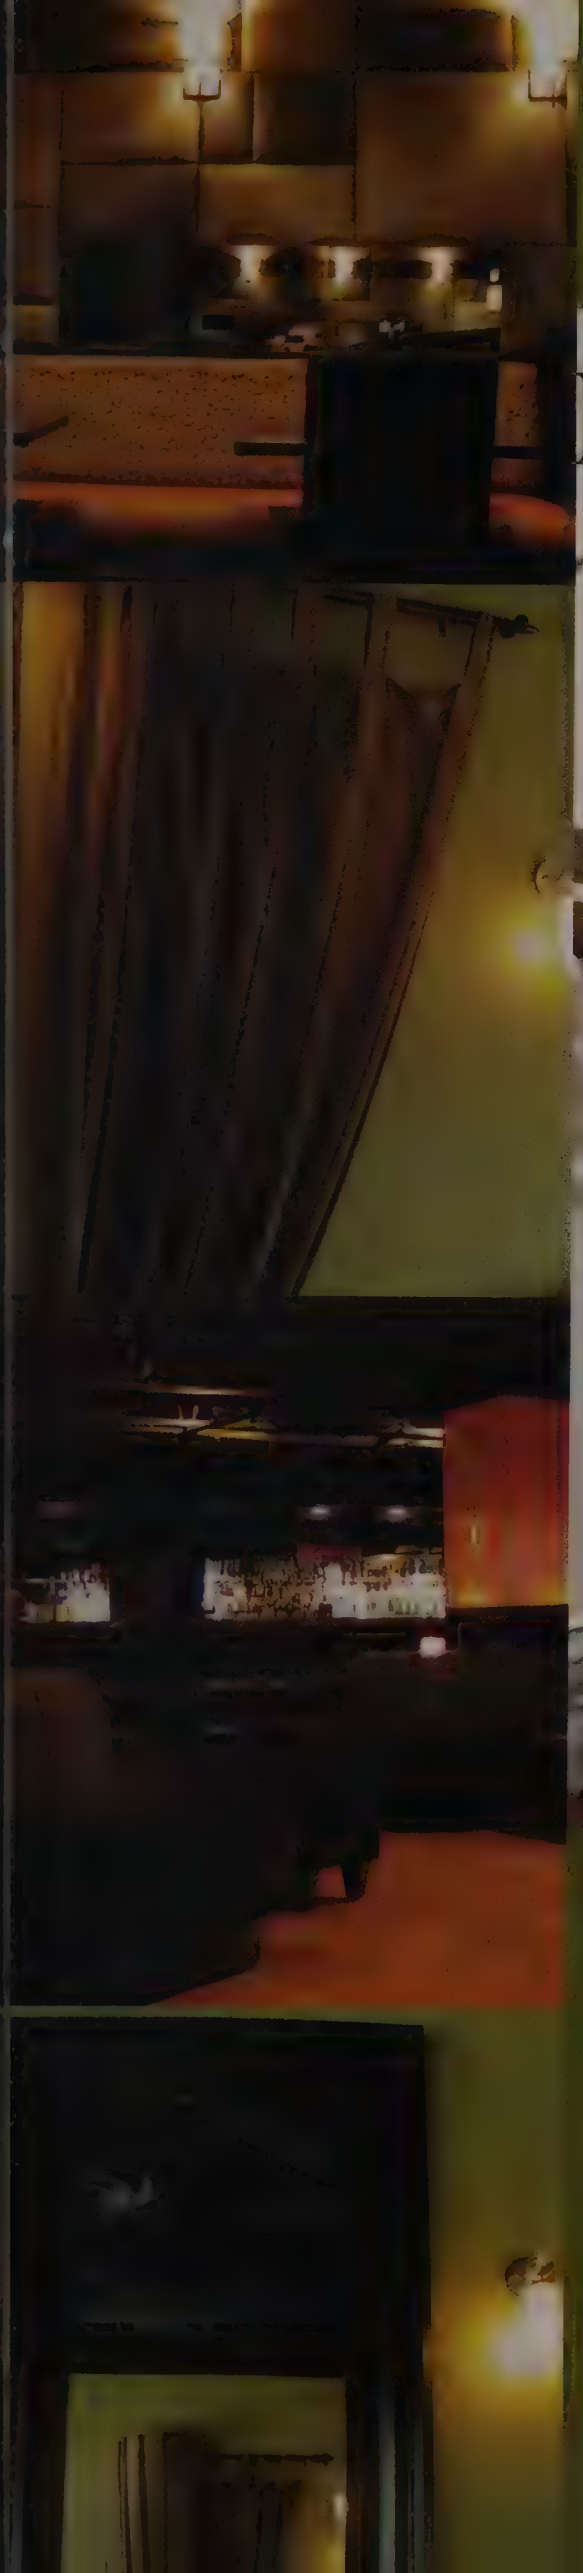
Heather: "Ned was right."

I can't deny it. Lately I've been making bad puns at an outrageous pace, and I'm wondering if there have just been more opportunities, or if I've reached the age when the Dad Humor gland kicks in and suddenly your brain becomes a pun machine.

Other recent examples: I saw "Hungarian mushroom soup" on a menu and felt compelled to say, "That must be for people who are really Hungary." When my friend Jen told me that her new boyfriend is really interested in the mining industry and wants to get into it from the ground up, I replied, "You mean from the ground down?" and followed up with, "He must really dig it." Finally, my friend Wilson forwarded me a news story about a deadly stampede in India that occurred when a politician began giving out free saris. I wrote back that I hope he said he was sari. Wilson replied, "That was Dadesque."

The strange thing is that my own Dad, while funny, isn't usually corny. His sense of humor is more Richard Pryor than Rodney Dangerfield. However, the habit of cracking yourself up (another symptom of my affliction) does run in the family, as I confirmed the other day while visiting my grandparents. My 80-year-old grandfather pointed to his white-yet-full head of hair and said, "You know I just started losing my hair a couple years ago? At this rate, in another few years I'm going to look like you." Then he cracked up while I tried to think of a comeback. What do you say to that? "Yeah, well um... you use a cane!" It's tough getting roasted by your grandfather.

I was having dinner the other night with my friends Doyle and Kara and Kara's parents, and I brought up my pun problem, using the mining comment as an example. I didn't refer to this as Dad Humor, though, out of deference to the actual dad in our midst. I needn't have worried. When I told Kara's dad about the mining enthusiast, he replied, "That sounds like a pretty mineless pursuit. I hope he doesn't get the shaft." Damn! I should've known better than to step to a dad with my Dad Humor. Doyle followed that up with "I hope his shaft doesn't collapse," which is clearly more in the perverted-uncle category.



I decided I needed to cleanse myself of the bad-joke habit, and there was only one way to do it: by re-reading the very worst joke book in existence. Dude, Got Another Joke? by Bob Phillips is the most unfunny collection of not-hilarious material ever published. Bob Dole is funnier than Bob Phillips. Ironically enough, this book was given to me by my friend Susan as a joke. Here are the first two one-liners in Chapter One, entitled "Radical Humor": "I won't say my house is a mess, but have you ever seen a fly land in a cloud of dust?" And, "If you woke up in the night, what would you do for a light? Take a feather from the pillow; that's light enough." All of a sudden, my bad jokes aren't looking so bad.

I'M WONDERING IF I'VE REACHED THE AGE WHEN THE DAD HUMOR GLAND KICKS IN AND YOUR BRAIN BECOMES A PUN MACHINE

The cover of Dude, Got Another Joke? boasts "over 5 million books sold," so I assume Phillips' other titles, such as So You Want to Be a Bible Trivia Expert, must be better than this one. But still. Here's one of his better jokes: "What do you call a girl who lies in the middle of a tennis court? Annette." Hey, if this guy can sell 5 million books with that kind of crap, maybe I'm in the wrong line of work. Here's one I just made up: "What do you call a girl with no arms and no legs lying on a bun? Patty." I should have a book.

I'll need more material, though. Maybe I'll get in touch with Kara's dad and see if he's available to help co-author Dad Humor Vol. 1. I could send him a fax, but I'm sure he'd probably prefer that I page him. IB

Soroff ON

ANTHONY KENNEDY SHRIVER

BY JONATHAN SOROFF

Anthony Kennedy Shriver with Billy Gallo

A scion of America's foremost political dynasty, Anthony Kennedy Shriver is the founder and chairman of Best Buddies International, a nonprofit devoted to people with intellectual disabilities. On May 22, the organization holds its annual fund-raiser, a bike ride from the JFK Library in Dorchester to the Kennedy compound in Hyannis Port. Through Shriver's stewardship, Best Buddies has grown to include six divisions and has served 300,000 participants and volunteers since its inception in 1989. In addition to programs in all 50 states, Best Buddies has programs in eight other countries, with additional programs under development in another 10. The son of Peace Corps founder Sargent Shriver and Special Olympics founder Eunice Kennedy Shriver, Anthony is a nephew of John F. Kennedy and a brother of Maria Shriver. A graduate of Georgetown University, Anthony has received such honors as the 1999 Jefferson Award for Greatest Public Service by an Individual Thirty-Five Years or Under as well as an honorary doctorate from Loyola College in Maryland. He lives in Miami Beach, Florida, with his wife, Alina, and the couple's four children, Teddy, Eunice, Francesca and Carolina.

NO MATTER HOW BIG YOUR DIFFERENCES, IF PEOPLE SIT DOWN, HANG OUT FOR AN HOUR, THEY FIND OUT THEY HAVE A LOT MORE IN COMMON THAN THEY THOUGHT.

Jonathan Soroff: How much has being a Kennedy shaped who you are?

Anthony Shriver: I think everybody's family shapes their values and direction to some extent. I clearly have two very influential parents and I grew up in an influential family, so I think my interest in public service and my interest in people with intellectual disabilities stems from my family's background. Having my Aunt Rosemary, who has intellectual disabilities, shaped that interest, and the fact that my Mom started Special Olympics and I sort of grew up with that spiked my interest in this population. It's a great family to be in, and public service is sort of the family business.

JS: Do you have the toothy grin or the accent?

AS: I didn't grow up in Boston, so I don't have the accent, but a lot of people complain that I have a lot of teeth, so I guess I do have the toothy grin.

JS: Who's the best sailor in your family?

AS: Besides me? My mother. After her, I guess my uncle, Senator Kennedy.

JS: Speaking of him, is he as much of a wild man as they say?

AS: He has a lot of energy, that's for sure. He's a lot of fun to be around. A lot of pep. A great guy.

JS: Ever consider naming your child Sargent Major Shriver—you know, just pile on the military titles?

AS: No, because I'd get in trouble with my sister. She already named her dog Sargent Shriver. I don't want her and Arnold [Schwarzenegger] getting mad at me.

JS: Speaking of your brother-in-law, have you ever arm-wrestled him?

AS: Of course, and I always win. He's an old man now. Remember that.

JS: Do you call him Governor?

AS: You don't want to know what I call him. It's not for publication.

JS: Ever make fun of his accent?

AS: I'd say it has been done at toasts and other occasions.

JS: So are we going to change the Constitution so that he can become president?

AS: I think we're going to change the Constitution, not so that he can become president, but because it's the right thing to do. I think he'd be a great president.

JS: Tell me a secret about him.

AS: Besides the fact that he's intimidated by my physical presence? That he's a very passive, peaceful human being, the opposite of how he's depicted in the movies.

JS: Your sister wears the pants in that family, right?

AS: I think in any marriage, the woman always wears the pants, if the marriage is gonna continue. Whenever you hear about a divorce, you find out the guy tried to wear the pants.

JS: One thing as a society we should change in our treatment of the mentally handicapped?

AS: Stop listening to stereotypes. In general, for everyone, people pass judgment and form opinions on whole segments of the population, races, ethnic groups, etc., based on stereotypes. That's why Best Buddies is so critical. The stereotypes go right out the window once you establish a relationship with another human being, whether it's an African-American, American Indian, Saudi Arabian, Pakistani, or someone with an intellectual disability. Forging a connection with people you know nothing about is a big step in the right direction.

JS: Handicapped people face so much bullying, which is a huge problem everywhere in our society. How do you stop it?

AS: I think those problems go away with friendship. No matter how fierce your enemy, or how big your differences, if people sit down at a table with someone, break bread, hang out for an hour, they find out they have a lot more in common than they thought. Even if they don't want to be best friends, they can at least respect each other.

JS: What's more important: intelligence or compassion?

AS: I'd say compassion.

JS: What member of your family do you admire the most?

AS: My mother.

JS: Why?

AS: She has enormous compassion and intelligence. She followed her gut and her heart her whole life and didn't succumb to the pressure of doing things the way society might have dictated. She held the course and she's been steady in her focus for 50 years. She's done it with an issue that has no sex appeal and doesn't garner power or prestige in the normal sense of the word—certainly not in the way her siblings did—and to pay that kind of attention to the least powerful members of our society is remarkable for someone who could have done anything she wanted to.

JS: Your father started the Peace Corps. Ever think of joining?

AS: Absolutely. But I guess I was too spoiled to go away for two years and live in a hut in Africa. I wish I had, in a lot of ways, but it's never too late. you know, an enormous percentage of volunteers for the Peace Corps are people in their 40s, 50s or 60s. Maybe my time will come.

JS: Does volunteerism make someone a good person?

AS: It's absolutely a step in the right direction. I don't know many committed, long-term volunteers who are really bad, hostile, angry people. When you give your time and energy to assist somebody else, it builds character, compassion, good fortune. Good things come your way when you volunteer.

JS: Fill in this blank: Anthony Shriver would like to be remembered as _____.

AS: I think I'll use that same word again: compassionate. iB

SOX BORROWING THE PATS' BLUEPRINT?

The real Jim O'Brien story; a long off-season for the Bruins?

The New England Patriots have a blueprint for success. A key element is the realization by all employees that pro football is a business. If you're better than the other guy, you play. If you're not, you get better or you're out. The red-carpet treatment is for kings, not athletes. Superstars like Terry Glenn and Lawyer Milloy have moved on, but when playoff time came, the Patriots had recovered from those losses, and they won it all. Now, it seems the Red Sox brass are taking a close look at the Patriots' management philosophy.

A source close to the team tells me many of the players don't like the new approach, or trust the man pulling the strings, Sox CEO and president Larry Lucchino. The belief among some in the Sox clubhouse is that general manager Theo Epstein is a puppet hired to carry out Lucchino's bidding. My source also said that if catcher Jason Varitek doesn't get a new deal, it will cause a major problem among the players. Red Sox management is facing the reality that the team can't afford to re-sign Varitek, Lowe, Ortiz, Pedro and Nomar when their contracts expire at the end of the year, but Varitek is so well respected that a falling-out over his contract could have a paralyzing effect on the Sox' immediate future.

The facts of the baseball business guarantee that the 2005 Red Sox won't have all the same stars as this year's team, just as the salary cap contributed to Lawyer Milloy's move to Buffalo. But the bottom line is that if the Sox brass can win two world championships in three years like the Patriots, no one will question the manner in which they got there.

I've heard it said several times over the past few months that former Celtics basketball coach Jim O'Brien quit on his team. That talk should stop. Celtics CEO Wyc Grousbeck found that out firsthand after he repeatedly said in a radio interview that O'Brien "quit." Shortly after, Grousbeck got a call from O'Brien's agent threatening legal action if that kind of talk continued. Technically, O'Brien resigned. But he wanted to finish up the year and call it a day afterward. O'Brien and Celtics director of basketball operations Danny Ainge had very different philosophies, so O'Brien wanted the two sides to get together and form an exit strategy at the end of the season.

The C's weren't interested, and I can't say I blame them. But to sell this as O'Brien quitting on the team is just inaccurate. Ainge has his own agenda—one that's not completely in line with that of Grousbeck's dad, Irv, who happens to be the Green team's biggest investor. The elder Grousbeck isn't happy with the team's direction and has explored getting out of the ownership game.

Two months ago, Ainge said the Celtics would be better off not making the playoffs, allowing the team to get a better draft selection. He was right, but the problem is, you're not supposed to say that publicly. Ainge also has other issues, according to his critics. His ability to evaluate talent is up for debate since he's traded away many of the big components of a decent basketball team. And now, new coach John Carroll and the players have body-slammed Ainge's master plan by making the playoffs.

Maybe the wrong guy resigned.

Speaking of O'Brien, he's headed home to coach the '76ers in his native Philadelphia. Superstar pain-in-the-butt Allen Iverson lobbied hard for O'Brien and got his wish (now let's see if AI can behave). Also, you can look for Celtics up-andcomer Mark Blount to follow O'Brien to cheesesteak heaven.

IF THE SOX CAN WIN TWO CHAMPIONSHIPS IN THREE YEARS, NO ONE WILL QUESTION THE MANNER IN WHICH THEY GOT THERE

I've saved the worst for last: the Boston Bruins.

Some fans are going to take a long time to get over the best-of-seven playoff loss to the Canadiens. Not me, however. I refused all year long to get sucked into the Bruins' regular-season success because I feared an early exit in the postseason. There's no excuse—not injuries, not Montreal's speed—for the Bruins' failure to win one of their last two games at the FleetCenter. None.

Joe Thornton, who is a great player and a great guy, is going to hear a lot about his 0–for–the playoffs, but to his credit he played hurt, like a gladiator.

With a work stoppage looming, this could be the longest Bruins off-season ever. Which is bad news for golfers around Boston. A bunch of unemployed hockey players will be looking to kill time, leaving the courses flooded with guys accustomed to hitting anything that moves. So beware. IB first-rate first dates

YOU'VE DONE THE ASKING... NOW WHERE DO YOU GO FOR A ROMANTIC EVENING?

BY JULIE SURATT PHOTOGRAPHS BY BRIAN SILVERSTEIN

After months of shy smiles and covert looks at the local Laundromat, you finally mustered the courage to ask your cute neighbor on a date, and your pitch worked. Good going. But before you start fantasizing about his-and-her wash loads, you've got one more hurdle to overcome: Where will you go?

The setting of this first date can affect the potential for a lasting relationship. Take her to a crowded bar, and you'll be shouting to be heard over the din of voices and loud music. Take him to the movies, and you're not likely to learn much more about him than the fact that he likes butter on his popcorn.

To really get to know your date—and fuel that connection you both felt as you lingered by the dryers—you've got to go to a restaurant where the focus is on you, the couple, and not the music, the stage or your fellow patrons. But how do you choose that one special place out of Greater Boston's seemingly endless selection of restaurants? (Zagat lists more than 700 in the city and suburbs.) Here are a few criteria to keep in mind as you narrow down the options: It should be quiet (but not dead—that can kill a date). Low lighting sets the mood. Tables should be spaced far enough apart that your neighbors aren't eavesdropping on your conversation (or vice versa). Reservations are a must: You don't want to be waiting an hour for a table when you don't know each other and you're both hungry. You might also consider a restaurant that's off the beaten path, so neither of you runs into friends or co-workers. And service should be attentive but not rushed.

With that wish list in mind, we checked out some potentially perfect spots for a special date, covering a range of price options (from impress-her expensive to charm on a budget) and cuisines (Spanish tapas to sushi to Southern grits). Here are eight restaurants that not only fit the criteria above but also have that certain je ne sais quoi that makes them feel like "the right place" from the moment you step through the door. We've also included suggestions for nearby bars, so that if the date's going well, you can extend the night a drink or two longer. May Cupid be with you.

Anthem

For the best overall atmosphere, Anthem wins hands down. Located in the former Commonwealth Beer & Fish Co., the space has retained the brewery's laid-back vibe despite the upscaled decor. Chef Robert Rathman, formerly of the Federalist and Grill 23 (and currently overseeing the kitchen at Azure, as well), has created a menu of gourmet comfort food—the kind of dishes you might find at, say, Cracker Barrel, but with a sophisticated twist and fancier ingredients. So the Southern fried chicken salad, for example, includes chicken tenders dipped in buttermilk, fried, and then tossed with spiced pecans, baby spinach, creamy ranch dressing and corn pone. Sit next to one of the huge picture windows that look out over the North Station neighborhood, get the interaction going by sharing the spinach and artichoke fondue, and talk for hours. 138 Portland St., Boston (617-523-8383).

Price range: Low (entrées under $19)

Advice: Start the evening with the Woodbury clams steamed with tomatoes, chorizo and white beans, and end it with the much-touted deep-fried Twinkie for dessert.

Extend the night...with a glass of wine at the Florentine Café (333 Hanover St.).

Osushi

Reserve a table at Osushi, Boston's hippest Japanese restaurant, if you want to appear in-the-know. Groovy, trip-hop music pulsates throughout the intimate 50-seat room located on the second floor of Copley Place, and candles and drop lights cast a soft glow on the red walls. Trendsetters toting shopping bags from Thomas Pink and Louis Vuitton stop in after facials at Grettacole. But don't mistake Osushi for a mall restaurant. The sushi and sashimi, prepared by Ken Iwaoka, former head chef at Ginza, are super fresh and downright pretty. Start with the chutoro (fatty tuna) carpaccio and share a carafe of Asian pear-infused sake. (Osushi sports an extensive sake selection.) Move on to seaweed salad served in a hollowed-out orange half, and then order à la carte off the sushi menu. Linger over a passion fruit sake-tini. If you don't fall for each other, you'll certainly fall for the food. 10 Huntington Ave., Boston (617-266-2788).

Price range: Low

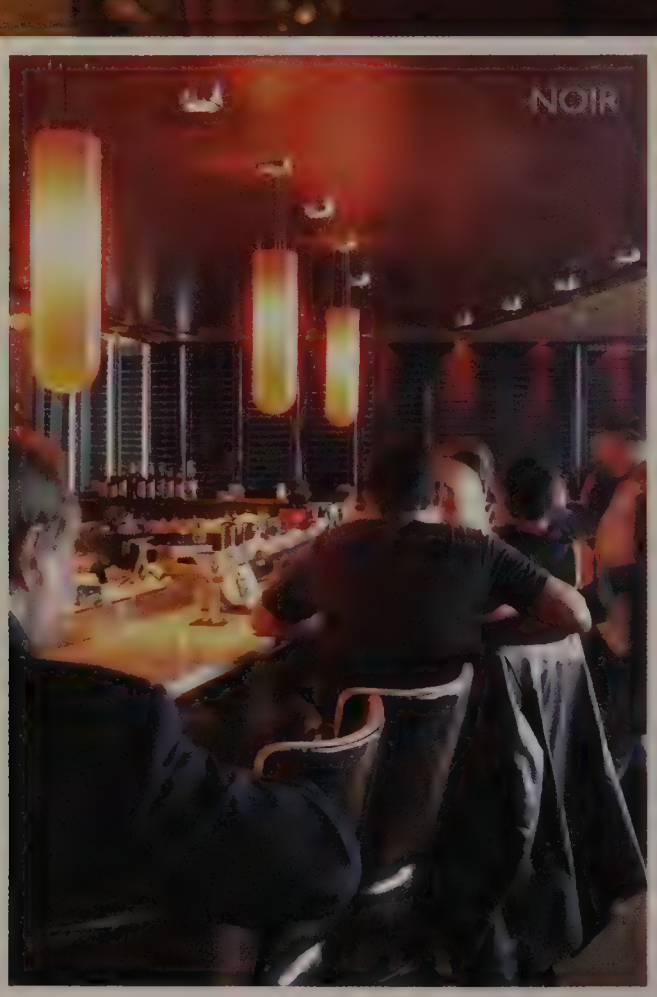
Advice: If your date's not good with chopsticks, ask for a knife and fork.

Extend the night...with martinis at the Oak Bar (138 St. James Ave.).

Peking Tom's

Chinese food on a date? Isn't that more appropriate in takeout containers when you've lured him/her back to your place on date three? Wait till you experience Peking Tom's. Chef Marc Orfaly of Pigalle fame has his way with dumplings, beef and broccoli, and barbecued spare ribs—cutting back on the grease and incorporating finer cuts of meat to appeal to the hipsters who frequent this Ladder District hot spot. Yes, it's a scene, but the good kind that makes you feel like an insider for having joined the fashionable throngs for après-work reveling. The axiom here is "When in a Chinese-American restaurant, do as the Americans do..." and selections include a pupu platter: crab Rangoon (real crab!), sesame chicken wings, beef teriyaki, pork spring rolls and orange tamarind–glazed ribs. All are sublime—especially after you and your date have sipped from a gigantic scorpion bowl for two. 25 Kingston St., Boston (617-482-6282).

Price range: Low



Advice: Weekends tend to be out-of-control crowded, especially late nights. Go on a weekday, so you can actually hear each other. Or make an early reservation.

Extend the night...with an order of chocolate fondue for two at Les Zygomates (129 South St.) and enjoy the live jazz.

Tapeo

There's something intimate about sharing a dish with someone. Perhaps your fingers accidentally touch as you pluck marinated olives off a ceramic plate or dip hunks of bread into a garlicky spread. It's like an aphrodisiac. On any given night at Tapeo on Newbury Street, you can spot couples who appear to be making such a connection over sangria and Spanish tapas. Order four or five small dishes—sharing an assortment of plates adds to the fun. You might even discover early on that Mr. Perfect refuses to eat anything covered with sauce...or that Ms. Right is a strict vegan (not that there's anything wrong with that). Standouts among the menu of hot and cold tapas include garlic shrimp, octopus vinaigrette, tortilla Española, baked goat cheese with tomato and basil, and pork tenderloin. The tables are set a bit close together, but that adds to the feeling of coziness, as do the two fireplaces and the copper-plated walls. 266 Newbury St., Boston (617-267-4799).

Price range: Low

Advice: Sit at the colorfully tiled bar. It feels like the patio of a Mediterranean taberna.

Extend the night...on the patio of the Armani Café (214 Newbury St.) and enjoy the people-watching.

Lala Rokh

Lala Rokh means "tulip cheeks," a term of endearment in the Persian language, and 19th-century Irish poet Thomas Moore adapted the term to give a name to the title character of his narrative work Lalla Rookh, An Oriental Romance. At the end of Moore's story, Lalla marries her prince and they live happily ever after. So you could get off to a good start simply walking through the doors of this enchanting Beacon Hill restaurant. Co-owner Babak Bina says the garden-level warren of rooms is decorated in the style of a summer home in Iran. It has the feel of a museum, with centuries-old artwork and turn-of-the-century photographs on every wall. The Persian menu might require explanation from the waiter. You can choose a hot or cold appetizer and then a main entrée paired with either torshi (chutney) or a mazze, or condiment, like yogurt with cucumbers and herbs. Or take the sampling route and order some appetizers and an entrée to share. Tasty options include velvety smoked eggplant, sautéed spinach with caramelized onions and homemade yogurt, and saffron-marinated chicken. Order some wine from Lala Rokh's reasonably priced list, and make it a night to remember. 97 Mount Vernon St., Boston (617-720-5511).

Price range: Medium (entrées $19–$25)

Advice: Don't miss the whole garlic cloves aged in vinegar for three and a half years. (Miraculously, they don't cause bad breath!)

Extend the night...at No. 9 Park (9 Park St.) or the Federalist (15 Beacon St.).

Craigie Street Bistrot

Parking in Cambridge is a challenge, and you may not snag one of the three spots reserved for Craigie Street Bistrot, but the restaurant's Web site has directions to a stretch four blocks away, in front of the Armenian Church, that doesn't require a resident parking permit. Consult those directions so you can be sure not to miss the (strictly adhered to) 15-minute window that Craigie Street allows for reservations. Once you enter this cozy, 49-seat French boîte on the outskirts of Harvard Square, the pace (and your heart rate) will slow down considerably. Craigie Street is all about leisure. Every dish is made to order in a tiny kitchen that's just large enough for chef Tony Maws and three other cooks. Appetizers (try the stew of cockles and wild Maine mussels, or farm-fresh eggs en cocotte) arrive promptly, but you might wait a bit longer for your entrées. That's the perfect pacing for a date, though, allowing you to get to know each other over sips of wine and sourdough rolls with fresh butter. In true French fashion, the menu changes every day, depending on what Maws finds at the market that morning. From the decor (kitschy French posters) to the pace to the menu, you'll feel transported to Paris' Rue de Cherche-Midi. 5 Craigie Circle, Cambridge (617-497-5511).

Price range: Medium

Advice: Ask your waiter for his or her recommendations. On my last visit, the waitress waxed poetic on the day-boat sea scallops, and she was right: They were out of this world.

Extend the night...with hot cocoa and sweets at Burdick's (52 Brattle St.) or martinis at Noir at the Charles Hotel in nearby Charles Square.

Excelsior

A trip to chef Lydia Shire's newest endeavor should probably be reserved for that truly special date. The view of the Public Garden is spectacular, especially when there's no foliage and you can see all the way to the lagoon. The menu offers choices like hacked ginger lobster tails, char-grilled wild king salmon and sugar-cane chicken—all phenomenal. As it should be at a restaurant of this caliber, service is attentive but unobtrusive. (When I visited, the hostess went so far as to fetch the elevator and show which door would open to the second-floor dining room.) Prices match the quality of the food and service, putting Excelsior in a category reserved for a date with Mr. or Ms. Right. If that's still TBD, you can always bypass the dining room upstairs and head straight to the swanky bar, which sports a more affordable menu of smaller bites prepared by Shire, as well as windows that open onto the street in the summer months. Whichever option you choose, you'll make a big impression. 272 Boylston St., Boston (617-426-7878).

Price range: High (entrées over $25)

Advice: Try the man's and woman's steaks: Each bears a toothpick labeled with the appropriate chromosome (X or Y). Feel free to gender swap.

Extend the night...seated on a couch at the Four Seasons' Bristol Lounge (200 Boylston St.).

LOVE IS ALL AROUND

Happily, there's no shortage of romantic restaurants in Boston. Here are a few more to consider for your next date.

Casa Romero Forget Chevy's or Taco Bell, this is the real deal: Mexican food served in an authentic South-of-the-Border atmosphere. In the summer, it's worth the wait to dine on the patio under the stars. 30 Gloucester St., Boston (617-536-4341).

The Enormous Room Kick off your shoes, prop yourself up with pillows on the carpeted platform and order a platter of Middle Eastern–inspired tastes to share. A DJ and dim lighting further set the mood. 567 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-491-5550).

The Hungry I A seat beside a crackling fire in a Beacon Hill brownstone…what more could you want? How about terrific French food? Sold. 71 Charles St., Boston (617-227-3524).

Kennedy's Midtown For an all-in-one date, this is the place. Indulge in steak tips in the Irish parlor, move to the bar for a pint of Guinness and cabaret tunes, and then hit the dance floor and show off your moves. 42 Province St., Boston (617-426-3333).

L Chef Pino Maffeo has reinvigorated the former Café Louis, bringing stylish and tasty Asian-fusion cuisine to this chic restaurant located adjacent to an upscale clothing store. 234 Berkeley St., Boston (617-266-4680).

La Morra Exposed brick walls and wooden beams, plus terrific Italian food prepared by former Tuscan Grill chef Josh Ziskin, make you feel like you're in Venice. 48 Boylston St., Brookline (617-739-0007).

L'Espalier Pricey, but oh-so-good New England–French cuisine served in an 1880 Back Bay townhouse. Save this for the one you may just end up marrying. 30 Gloucester St., Boston (617-262-3023).

Oleana Nothing's sweeter than a seat on Oleana's patio on a warm summer night—except maybe chef Ana Sortun's gourmet eats. 134 Hampshire St., Cambridge (617-661-0505).

Pigalle A real find, literally. Tucked away behind the Theater District, Pigalle offers a mini trip to Paris with delicious food prepared by chef Marc Orfaly and a wonderfully attentive wait staff overseen by his wife, Kerri Foley. 75 Charles St. South, Boston (617-423-4944).

75 Chestnut Located in a converted Beacon Hill townhouse, 75 Chestnut has a cozy, homey feel but serves food that's decidedly more gourmet than you'd find in your own humble abode (unless, of course, you're a James Beard award winner). 75 Chestnut St., Boston (617-227-2175).

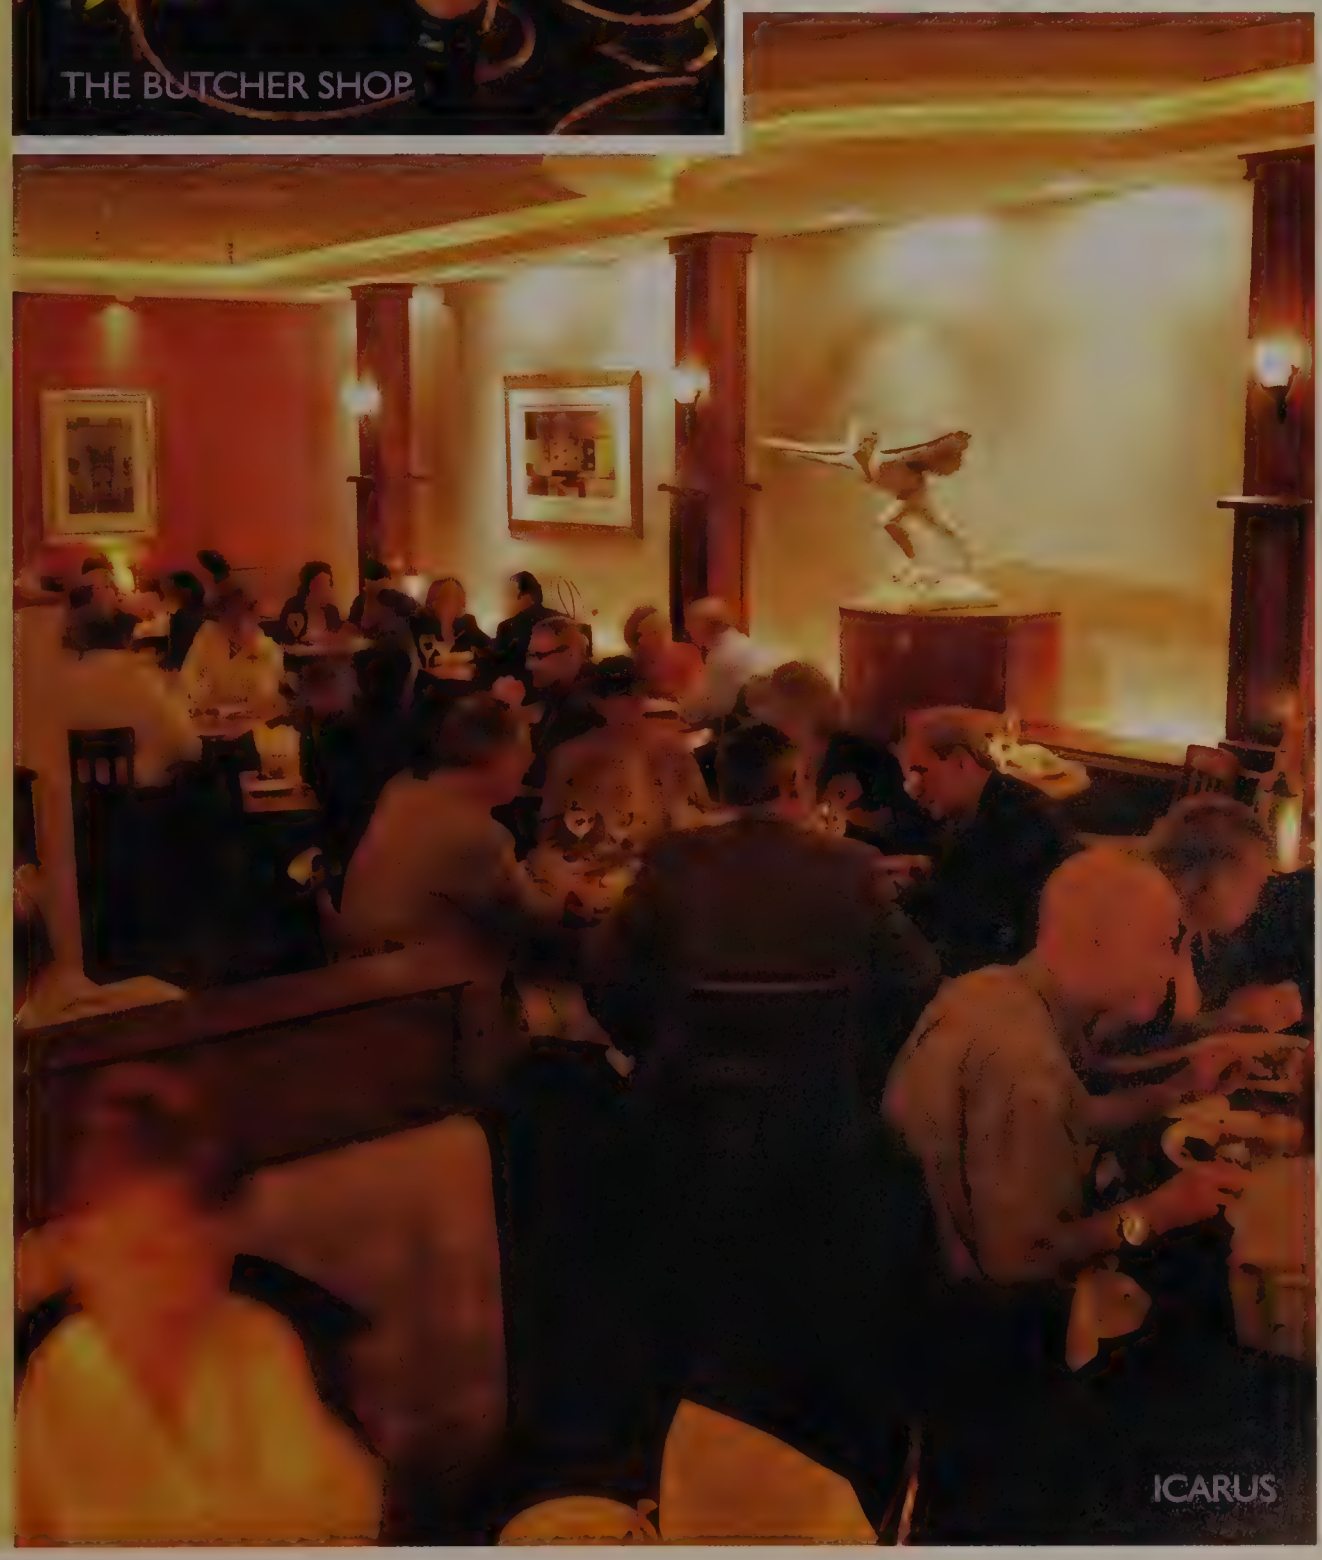
Tangierino Dim lighting, low tables and plush banquettes with colorful pillows lend an exotic feel to this Moroccan restaurant. 83 Main St., Charlestown (617-242-6009).

Top of the Hub Can't beat the view, and now, thanks to the efforts of executive chef Mark Porcaro and executive pastry chef Tommy Choi, the food and desserts are tops too. Prudential Center, Boston (617-536-1775).

Trattoria a Scalinatella Instead of spaghetti and meatballs, think handmade pappardelle in a wild boar ragu at this hidden gem in the North End. If it's a chilly night, request a seat near the fireplace. 253 Hanover St., Boston (617-742-8240).

UpStairs on the Square Sitting downstairs at UpStairs, in the Monday Club bar, gives you the chance to indulge in gourmet cuisine at a more affordable price. 91 Winthrop St., Cambridge (617-864-1933).

THE BUTCHER SHOP



Icarus

One Icarus waitress tells me that marriage proposals are common at the restaurant. I can understand why. It's quiet, with low ceilings, and instead of overhead lights (which can sometimes make you feel like you're in the spotlight), small lamps adorn every table, along with a single flower. It feels like the dining room of an upscale social club: lots of dark wood, comfy upholstered chairs in the lounge and wooden bookshelves clustered with faded cloth hardbacks. Snuggled into a booth, you'll feel miles apart from the other guests scattered around the room at antique wooden tables. The prices at Icarus are, well, pricey, but chef Chris Douglass' cuisine ranks among the city's best, and the service is top-notch. Especially recommended are the appetizer of polenta with braised exotic mushrooms and the grilled striped bass with brandade de Morue and blood oranges. 3 Appleton St., Boston (617-426-1790).

Price range: High

Advice: The chocolate molten soufflé cake for two takes 20 minutes to prepare, but it's oh-so worth it. Order it when you arrive.

Extend the night…with a glass of wine at The Butcher Shop (552 Tremont St.). iB

BABE MAGNETS

WE TAKE A PUPPY, A BABY AND A SNAZZY CAR TO NEWBURY STREET TO SETTLE THE AGE-OLD QUESTION: WHICH ONE ATTRACTS THE MOST GIRLS

BY EZRA DYER PHOTOGRAPHS BY RICHARD SMITH

Conventional wisdom has it that certain accessories attract women like ants to a peanut butter and jelly sandwich left on the ground. You've heard the stories: Your friend has a puppy and swears he can't walk down the street without getting mobbed by girls. Another friend has a baby and bemoans the cruel irony of the kid's woman-pulling power. Someone else just plunked down the money for a flashy new car and says nothing makes a first impression with the ladies like a pimpin' ride. Is there truth to any of this, or do these stereotypical chick magnets belong next to "cell phones cause brain cancer" in the great index of unfounded urban lore?

To find out, I procured a puppy, a toddler and a car and set out to find which one garnered the most attention. The contest was merely to see what prompted the greatest number of girls to talk to me, since attempting anything like getting phone numbers would call my highly questionable game into play, thus skewing this precise scientific experiment.

Our test-puppy was a 10-week-old black pug named Oscar. He's tiny, gregarious, and cuter than a warehouse full of Anne Geddes posters. The babe-attracting baby was Colby, a 2-year-old with a winning smile. Finally, we have the car, a 2004 BMW 645Ci convertible, which is brand-new, expensive and unequivocally sexy. If you don't look good in this car, you need to drive it straight to the Swan tapings and get your face fixed.

I took these three ringers to the most unforgiving crucible of profiling in Boston, Newbury Street on a Saturday. From Arlington Street to Mass. Ave., the strip is awash in Porsches, designer clothes and beautiful people. Janet Jackson could pilot a spaceship down Newbury Street with both boobs out and people wouldn't look up from their tuna carpaccio. If you get attention here, you get attention anywhere. On then, to the results.

THE CAR

Much of BMW's recent styling has been controversial, but everyone seems to agree that the new 6 Series looks gorgeous, particularly the convertible. Driving down Newbury Street, a guy pulls up next to us, scopes out the 6 and shouts to his passenger, "That car is f---ing sick!" While I'm stopped at a light, a 20-ish guy wearing head-to-toe designer duds and walking two boxers on leashes says, "That's a sweet car! I'm on the waiting list for one. Hey, how'd you get that?" I smile and drive away, proud that I've restrained myself from screaming, "Don't you know who I am?!" which is something you want to do a lot while driving this car.

Other comments I heard while driving the 645 included, "That is the phattest BMW I've ever seen!" "Sick car!" and simply, "Nice." The only problem is that all those lines came from guys. Comments from women are far more sporadic, but the thing to remember is that most other cars, even rare and expensive ones, don't get any attention from women at all. So when a girl in a BMW Z3 rolled up next to me at a stop light and asked how I liked the car, I had to remind myself that girls in BMW convertibles don't normally chat me up at intersections. The car was at work, just like when I was creeping through traffic on Boylston Street and a well-dressed woman in her 50s shouted, "That is a beautiful car! And a handsome man driving it!" Why thank you, Boylston Street sugar mama. I also had a group of teenage girls in Southie yell, "That is a phat caaaaahhh!" as I drove past, which demonstrates that this chick magnet appeals to a wide babeographic.

THE BABY

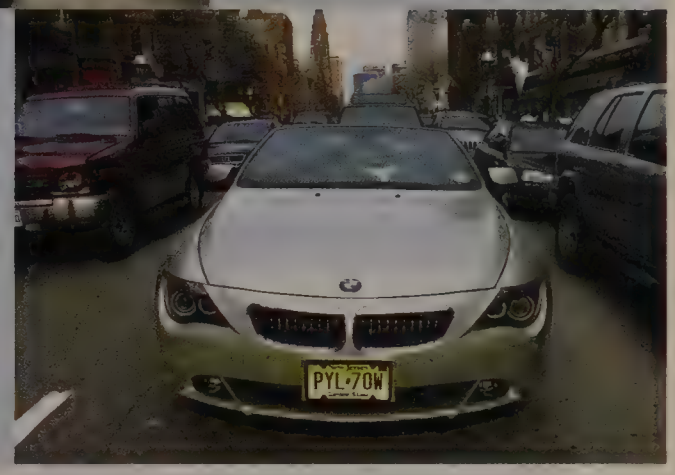
At 2 years old, Colby isn't a real baby, which is probably a good thing for babe-baiting. Real babies are ugly, hairless little lumps that do little except scream, wet themselves and stare aimlessly into space, sort of like Yankees fans. Colby, on the other hand, looks like a scaled-down actual person and can walk and talk—a big advantage. Sure, his vocabulary is limited now, but in another few months he'll probably be a functional wingman as well as a lure.

The catch to using a child to attract girls was articulated by Colby's father, Rick. "The problem with a kid is that he connotes baggage," said Rick, who suggested concocting a story to distance myself from the obvious implication. "You could say he's an Iraqi orphan," Rick offered. Yeah, I liked that. But you've got to talk to the girl to get to that point in the first place. I needed to do something more immediately apparent, like wear a Big Brothers T-shirt, or walk around loudly exclaiming, "You're really cute for a child who's not mine, one I'm just baby-sitting for the day because I'm such a nice guy who's good with children!"

I opted for none of the above and decided to see how things played out. It was looking dicey as I headed toward Newbury Street, as Colby's regular afternoon nap had been truncated by this excursion and he was looking a little cranky. He's normally free with the smiles, but after nap time he goes through a quiet phase and is less sociable. I considered giving him coffee but figured I'd get in trouble if he ends up only four feet tall because I gave him a Venti latte when he was 2 so he'd be cute for girls.

Of course, that wasn't going to be an issue if I couldn't figure out how to get him out of his car seat. But little did I know, I'd stumbled upon a great ploy, henceforth to be known as the Car Seat Move. It's unclear whether the girl approached me because of the car or Colby, since she seemed to like them both, but that's why I'm not a scientist. Anyway, I confessed that I didn't know how to get Colby out of his car seat—which effectively communicated that I'm not Daddy—and she showed me how it's done. Her name was Alison and she was from Bermuda, of all places. Before I could vocalize the George Costanza thoughts running through my head and scare her off ("If you're from Bermuda, where do you go on vacation?"), Oscar arrived and stole the show.

THE MAGNETS



THE BABY
Name: Colby
Age: 2 years
Cost: $177,700 through age 18 (according to AOL News parenting study)
Maintenance: Regular diaper changes, meals and afternoon naps.
Ladies love him because: If you say the nonsense word "itawa," he freaks out and nobody knows why.

THE PUPPY
Name: Oscar
Age: 10 weeks
Cost: $600
Maintenance: Housebroken but has small bladder and needs to go outside regularly; doghouse must be cleaned periodically; eventually going to have to be neutered, the little freak.
Ladies love him because: He weighs four pounds and has attention deficit disorder.

THE PUPPY

If ever an animal was made for this assignment, it's Oscar. He's almost small enough to fit in your hand, and everything he does is cute. If he sits, he's cute. If he hops around energetically, he's cute. If he barks, it's a tiny-yet-determined bark—cute. He could probably take a dump in your hand and it would be cute. The crowning touch: He has a tag of Oscar the Grouch on his collar. Genius.

Roughly 30 seconds after taking Oscar's leash, I was surrounded by women. Literally. There was a circle around me, and the questions were flying. What's his name? What kind of dog is he? How old is he? How big will he get? It was like magic. Colin Farrell standing naked in the street handing out free Coach bags wouldn't get this much female attention. One girl spotted his Oscar the Grouch tag and squealed, "Oh no, you don't have Oscar on your collar! That is the cutest thing ever." Several girls actually proclaimed Oscar a babe magnet, which was certainly the truth.

The size of the crowd varied, but there was always a crowd. At one point I handed Colby the leash to create an unbeatable babe-magnet trifecta: a cute two-year-old holding a 10-week-old puppy in front of a brand-new BMW convertible. They were unstoppable, and it was a wonder to behold. "I've never seen anything like this," said photographer Richard as he recorded the action.

And nobody will see anything like it again anytime soon, though I might try to get Colby and Oscar together for a reunion. I'm sure they'd like to play together some more, and visit new places like the Wellesley College campus, or Healthworks, or maybe Centerfolds… IB flirting

A BRIEF PRIMER ON OUR MOST UNDERRATED MODERN ART

A true story: It's Winter 1999. I've been in Boston for about a year. I am, of course, desperately lonely. I agree to attend a poetry reading with my friend Dave, and afterwards he drags me to a bar. The place is packed. There is Irish music playing. I am drinking a beer, though I don't like beer. I spot a woman.

She has thick, brown hair, a large, shapely nose, a white blouse. I am stupidly, blindingly smitten. She is sitting with a few friends. I point her out to Dave and he says, "Why don't you go say hello?"

Right, I think. Hello.

But just then I'm struck by the world's most primal flirting fear: What comes after hello? During that moment when both parties recognize that interest is being expressed, and it's up to the flirter (in this case, me) to convince the flirtee (her) that my attentions are worth being indulged.

What am I supposed to say? I noticed your hair. It's real nice.

Am I supposed to tell a joke?

I don't know any jokes.

There are other problems: I've neglected to wash my hair. I am dressed for a poetry reading, where no one cares how you look, which is to say, as is often the case, I am dressed poorly.

Instead, I settle on an ingenious strategy of long-distance flirting, which consists of staring at her, waiting for her to notice me. She does not. Her friends do. At first they seem, well, amenable. They whisper into her ear. She looks over and sort of half smiles.

Logic now dictates that I should go over and say something, anything. But I am paralyzed by fear. So I continue to stare, while the object of my affection, understandably, grows more and more nervous.

Eventually, she gets up, and for a moment I convince myself she might actually be headed my way; my strategy (which combines elements of both shyness and stalking) has worked!

Then a bouncer comes over and explains that I am making people "nervous" and asks if I would mind taking my business elsewhere.

I return home and pound my head against the wall.

I mention this episode not just because it marked the low point of my life as a flirter, but because it offers many valuable lessons for those of you who (like me) basically suck at flirting.

Lesson number one is (to quote Sergeant Hulka): Lighten up, Francis!

The essential reason I failed so miserably in the above instance was that I was taking myself, and my mission, way too seriously.

Flirting means you're not making any great big commitments. You're just checking to see if there's any chemistry there. Period.

Lesson number two: So you get shot down, so what?

My true failure was not just that I was creepy (though I was certainly, in retrospect, very creepy) but that I was too much of a scaredy-cat to just go up to the woman and give it the old college try. But see, that's what most decent folks are going to appreciate: someone who makes an honest effort.

This brings us to lesson three: Know when you're being shot down.

Sometimes, sad to say, the energy is not there. The woman (or man) you've targeted isn't smiling, isn't touching your arm, isn't laughing at your imitation of Ted Kennedy snorting bean dip. She appears more interested in her cuticles.

Men, this does not mean she's shy. (Even shy people find a way to express interest.) It means no sale.

Your job now is a painful but simple one: Move on. Do not try to batter your way through the defenses. Do not turn snarky or hateful. This will result in bad flirt karma and will drive other desirable candidates away. After all, the person you just dissed has friends, in the world at large and very likely at the party you're both attending.

It's nothing personal. You pitched. She didn't swing. Find another batter.

And remember: Even Casanova got shot down. (He just didn't write about it.)

Lesson four is especially important, in the face of lesson number three: This is supposed to be fun.

Flirting is nothing more, or less, than an improvised dance of gestures and words. And, as any old hand at improv will tell you, this requires that you remain loose, pay attention and enjoy yourself.

You don't have to be brilliant or charming right out of the gate. You don't have to follow some lame Cosmo checklist. (Smile, play with your hair, blah-blah-blah…)

Such performance pressure will only muck you up. I've found it's actually OK to be goofy.

Which brings us to our fifth, and most important lesson: Good flirting, true flirting, is an end in itself.

You're not doing it because you want to get him or her into the sack (though that might, circumstances permitting, happen). You're doing it because the world is a sexy place, and you're at a party, amid the din of human company, and you want to connect with someone.

And the truth is, people can sniff out your ulterior motives. If you're just chatting some woman up because you want in her pants, she's going to know it, within about 15 seconds. And chances are she's going to react with something less than Girls Gone Wild enthusiasm.

In fact, the coolest flirting I've ever done or seen has had nothing to do with sex. It's just two people (of any age or gender) doing a little getting-to-know-you dance.

Let me conclude with a story relayed to me by my great-aunt Meta, who's 96 years old.

A couple of years ago, when she was a spring chicken of 94, she left her apartment on Central Park West to meet a friend for dinner.

It was February, the streets were icy, and a strong wind came up. Meta was standing on the corner, trying to decide whether to attempt to cross the street, when a group of young guys happened past.

One of them saw Meta's situation and offered to serve as her escort.

He did so, taking her arm and leading her all the way to the restaurant. She thanked him in her elegant European accent. Then, just before he turned away, with all his friends watching, he leaned in close, so his cheek was almost touching hers, and said, "Can I have your number?"

Now that's what I call flirting. iB

FIVE THINGS TO REMEMBER WHEN YOU'RE TRYING TO SURVIVE A BIG BREAKUP

Let's get right to it: Breakups, even the ones you know are good for you, can be pure hell. As you move through the darkest days, wads of Kleenex filling your pockets and crazy thoughts filling your head, you may not recognize the puffy-eyed person staring back at you in the mirror. Family members will attempt to cheer you with sayings like "What's meant to be is meant to be"; your friends will drag you to parties when you'd rather be hiding under the covers; and your therapist will tell you to "feel the feelings" when that's the thing that hurts the most.

I know. Last October, my "dreamboat" (as my friends called him) and I split up. Parted ways. Boom. Over. The first months passed in a blur. I rode the train to and from work each day, encapsulated by a bubble of sadness. At night I sat on the couch—grateful for the warmth of my cat, Pearl, curled up on my lap—and watched endless episodes of bad reality TV. I cried through weekends. Months passed, and I experienced my emotions not in words but in colors: November, December: black. January: dark gray. February: light gray. March: burnt orange.

As I write this now, at the start of April, I've begun to spend less time on the couch and more time out in the world—going for walks, calling friends and interviewing the people in this story. For those enduring a breakup, or still feeling the aftershocks of one, the following five "rules of the potholed road" are meant to serve as smoke signals of hope, sent up by a local therapist, some breakup survivors and me; reminders that most people go through this experience at times, and things turn out OK.

Your breakup may cause other people to act strangely.

Heartbreak is one of those universal things, like language, reason and holey socks, that are part of being human. But of the 20 or so people I approached to discuss the topic, most responded as if I'd asked them to undergo a root canal. Some said the pain was too personal to share, while others had this superstitious feeling that dwelling on lost love would bring bad luck. "I've been happily married for years," one woman said. "And I'd like to keep it that way, thank you."

Considering people's aversion to the subject, I expected a small turnout when I went to see Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind, a movie that explores just how far people will go to erase the pain of heartbreak. When I arrived at the Kendall Square Cinema one rainy Saturday night, the lobby was packed—the show sold out seconds after I got my ticket. Before the lights went down, I spotted an old friend seated up front who days earlier had dodged my questions about her breakup. Throughout the movie, as Jim Carrey's character sank deeper into a funk, I scanned the faces around me. The expression I saw most was an interesting mix of both "I can relate" and "Glad that's not me!" Breakups, I've decided, have a weird effect on people: Most don't want to talk about their own, but they have no qualms about getting a front-row seat to examine someone else's.

It's perfectly normal to have strange reactions to your own breakup.

"There's a whole range of possible things that people will think and feel when they go through a breakup," says Brenda Smith, a Back Bay psychotherapist who helps clients deal with grief and loss. "There can be depression, irritability, low tolerance for frustration, annoyance, guilt, shame, self-blame, those kinds of things. Breakups can affect us in different ways and in ways that aren't typical for us."

Iain, a 42-year-old South Boston computer consultant, describes a period of intense paralysis when his girlfriend ended their relationship in March 2003, soon after he moved from London to Boston to be near her: "For three weeks, I didn't sleep or eat much. I lost 25 pounds, and I looked like hell."

Greg, 34, a seafood salesman from Beverly, started drinking heavily when he and his wife separated in May 2000. "I was self-abusive at first," he says. "There was a moment when I said to myself, 'I'm going to drink like nobody's business.' My tolerance level at its highest point was wiping out a liter of bourbon in a night."

Maria, a 33-year-old editorial production manager from Brighton who went through a breakup just five months ago, began torturing herself with obsessive thoughts when her ex moved on: "When I found out that he had a new girlfriend, I fell apart. I kept imagining scenarios of them together—having fun, having sex, sharing things. I kept wondering if she was prettier, more fun, better than me."

Throughout the winter, I also had waves of nausea, self-destructive bouts and torturous fantasies. March marked a turning point; I began to cry less. But even though I felt stronger, the world around me still seemed fragile. The potential for loss echoed everywhere—from the front-page headlines about terrorist bombings to the hungry pigeons pecking at invisible specks on the ground. One day, as I took a walk around my Somerville neighborhood, I saw signs describing a lost cat named Monkey. The pictures of little Monkey—a white, indoor cat, just like mine—made my heart ache. I decided that I had to find him. Each day I went out, peering under porches for a white blur of fur, and each day I came home empty-handed. As the weeks passed and the pictures of Monkey wilted in the rain, I felt my spirit wilt as well. Lost cat, lost love, lost me.

Grieving may take longer, and may require more energy, than you think.

Karen, a marketing professional in her 40s who lives on the South Shore, is still mourning a 10-year relationship that ended almost a year ago. "I'm still heartbroken," she says. "The man is the love of my life, and it's really hard to say it's over." Yet Karen is allowing herself ample time to mourn. "Nobody can tell you when you should get over it. If you're hurting, you're hurting."

Smith, the psychotherapist, agrees. "Recovering from grief is not going to happen in a straight line. It's more of a roller coaster. You can have severe grief, and then it starts to abate, and then something will trigger it again."

The triggers are inescapable. On a recent Saturday, Maria got a burst of energy and decided to run some errands. "I was at the Laundromat, picking up my prefolded clothes, and there were his clothes in a big, clear bag sitting right next to mine, name tag and all! I walked out of there so sad. But I did breathe a sigh of relief—I didn't spot any panties in there."

I also experience those deer-in-the-headlights moments. As I gathered some things to take to a dinner party recently, I pulled my large tote bag from the closet. Inside the bag: shells, left over from the last beach trip I took with my ex. It was August. We drove to the Cape and laughed as we dove into the icy waves. Driving back that night, my hair thick with salt, I could still feel the pull of the waves against my body. I was so exhausted—and so content.

Learning to take good care of yourself is the best thing you can do right now.

Breakups aren't a time for abandoning yourself or setting unreasonable goals for your recovery. "Good self-care is a major part of grief work," says Smith. "Self-care, like eating well and having an exercise program, will help people get through the stages of change."

Once they get over the shock of being alone, even the most heartbroken souls can find things that sustain them. Iain eventually regained his appetite and began to dabble in photography. "I concentrated on making myself happy," he says. "I've got this artistic side that's coming out, which wasn't there when I was with her."

After a long, self-destructive stretch, Greg realized he "needed to take a step back" from his life. Last year, he took a two-month trip to Thailand. "Young chicks were everywhere, but I was there to take all the marbles that had fallen out of my head and cram them back in. I was swinging in a hammock, collecting my thoughts. There was no need to get wasted every night, no need to do anything but listen to the roosters and watch the geckos running around."

Maria and Karen, still feeling the sting of their breakups, are finding comfort in self-help materials. Maria is currently reading Letting Go: A 12-Week Personal Action Program to Overcome a Broken Heart, by Zev Wanderer and Tracy Cabot. She also visits Breakupgirl.net. Karen, meanwhile, is rereading Why Men Love Bitches, by Sherry Argov.

There are numerous options for filling the void, such as gardening, exercising, volunteering, taking a class or renting movies. The trick is knowing what works for you. When I'm really feeling down, I head to CVS and buy shampoo.

Trust that grief does not last forever.

"Grieving is a process," says Smith, "but it does have an end. The process gets easier, and the breakup gets dimmer. People are more resilient than they think."

Iain, once sick with despair, now plans to show his photographs in a gallery by the end of the summer. "I wouldn't want to go through all that pain again," he says, "but I've really grown as a person." Greg, meanwhile, has been working on maintaining a new relationship. As for his love affair with bourbon, he says, "that tide has gone out."

Maria and Karen are surrounding themselves with caring friends and testing the boundaries of their own strength. Maria recently hosted a raucous party, attended by me, at which she seemed to float upon her own contagious laughter. Karen is "trying to stay busy" and indulges herself with anything she needs at the moment, which often involves chocolate.

As for me, I face each day shaky but receptive. I've just started a class in oil painting and find surprising solace in tubes of French ultramarine, lemon yellow and alizarin red. But here is the most important thing: I felt truly happy the other day. As I walked to work, I noticed new signs posted in my neighborhood. "After being lost for weeks," the signs said, "Monkey the cat was found." iB

THE GENERATION ZAP

Emily Franklin of Newton has written Liner Notes, a novel about a mother, a daughter and old songs.

In Liner Notes, a mother and her adult daughter go on a road trip. This takes place before the daughter starts a job as an art restorer, and after the mother's receives the good news that her long-lasting cancer is in remission. Their soundtrack consists of tapes of daughter Laney's favorite songs—playlists included—from each phase of her life. The songs have scratched an evoking groove into each mini-era, and Laney narrates the stories of her young life—bouncing with the merriment of friendships, chickships and guyships. The book is alive with dialogue. Laney's old friends are an engaging crew, and as some get engaged, then married, Laney finds herself in a kind of single limbo, especially when her nonboyfriend friend—one of those perfectly pitched relationships—gets married. Mother and daughter reminisce about old times and friends, updating, laughing, pouring retrospect and repair onto old memories. Because Mom had been sick during long stretches of Laney's life, she gets a second-wind look at her daughter. In the coziness of their relationship, surprising parallels in their lives are revealed. And happily, the book comes to a shout-for-joy romantic conclusion.

In blazingly modern Kendall Square there's a tucked-away historic treasure of a hotel, the Kendall, with its cozy, publike Black Sheep restaurant. Both are housed in an 1893 red brick Victorian firehouse with beautiful detail outside— gables and cornices, plus arched windows all top-hatted by a white cupola. The lobby looks more like a living room than an inn. It's the essence of homeyness, with chairs huddled around a roaring fire, lounging ceramic dalmations, red wagons and antique fire station buckets. The decor, the antithesis of hotel-bland, features quilts, fat Stetson hat boxes, bumpity traveled trunks and old prints. One extraordinary bedroom is painted in mintissimo blue, so stingingly fresh you can almost taste the color. Some rooms have double queen beds with huge, painted headboards; one has a yellow-painted desk. The bathrooms are gorgeous. Spaciousnes prevails there, as well as in the rooms and hallways. Just inside the front door, screened off behind ar irregular white wooden wall, is the Black Sheep a tiny restaurant for guests and outsiders that offers ap pealing breakfast, lunch and dinner. Though technology booms just beyond the walls, in here you fee you could be in the English countryside.

So it is with this trip to Brazillerville, ethnic not only in its groceries but in the smiling warmth, smoochy sexiness and Portuguese chat of the shoppers. A lively lunchtime deli offers fast, exotic food—chicken cooked in a dome-shaped crust, a stick of pork with spicy juttings, and a kind of lasagna called coxinha. Flan-like cakes drip ping the sweetness of condensed milk (itself a popular item on the shelves) are sold by the piece or full-size, and a jimmy-covered chocolate cake is a favorite you could get to know. The meat counter is full of beautifu steaks, sausages and salted meats cut to par ticular thinness for barbecues. Find fresh farmer's cheeses and cooked ones, familiar yogurts in jazzier-then-Dannon packaging passion fruit and guava juice, yams and peeled coconuts. Other specialties, pretty and accessible, are tiny, gray-speckled quail eggs, aristocratically silky hearts of palm and those Rio requisites: bras and thongs.

AN ITALIAN JOB WELL DONE

La Morra is another winner for Brookline's dining scene

BY J. CHARLES MOKRISKI • PHOTOGRAPHS BY DEREK KOUYOUMJIAN

Brookline is a town of many restaurants, diverse in cuisine, supported by loyal patrons, anchored in walkable neighborhoods. Some are exemplary—Taberna de Haro, Fugakyu and Washington Square Tavern spring to mind. Others are merely adequate. While new restaurants launch and old ones fall by the wayside from time to time, breaking into this fragmented market is a challenge for even the most intrepid culinary entrepreneur. Nevertheless, Josh Ziskin has taken the town by storm.

Ziskin made his mark at the Tuscan Grill in Waltham, a worthy suburban Italian outpost. He went on to hone his skills at Belvedere, a first-rate restaurant in the delightful hilltop town of La Morra, one of the seven communes of what is arguably Italy's most highly regarded wine region, Barolo, near Alba in the northwest.

While Ziskin's Piemontese experience informs the cuisine at his new restaurant, La Morra, which opened in December, he also draws on traditions from across northern Italy. For example, he offers a number of cicchetti, Venetian tapas, as a splendid way to begin a meal here. Arancini di riso ($4) a moist, rounded pyramid of risotto, redolent of flavorful stock and accented with cheese, was carefully fried to a golden brown in high-quality olive oil. Olive farcite ($3) consisted of four large, pitted green olives, breaded and fried, an imaginative, fun treat. Polpette ($4), Tuscan meatballs containing prosciutto and porcini mushrooms, boasted an intriguing, complex flavor, but their texture seemed a trifle dense. No such affliction flawed the pate di baccala ($3.50), Italy's version of French brandade—salt cod blended with pureed potatoes and olive oil. It was exceptionally smooth in texture, with mellow yet distinctive flavor, and not too salty.

Antipasti included a small bowl of vongole al peperoncini ($9), six pleasantly resilient clams in their shells, steamed with finely diced red cherry peppers and wine, evocative of the Ligurian coast. Lumache (snails) sautéed with baby artichokes, garlic and rosemary were remarkably tender, sautéed in olive oil but finished in brown butter, and mercifully without that musty flavor that sometimes bedevils snails. The least memorable of the antipasti, the beef carpaccio ($8)—an almost transparently thin slice of raw beef sprinkled with extra-virgin olive oil—came with a garnish of roasted garlic, bread crumbs and mâche greens, in a portion so tiny that it failed to make much of an impression. Better as an appetizer was one of La Morra's contorni, or side dishes, the cavolonero ($4.25), a small bowl of first-rate, pleasantly bitter black Tuscan cabbage, studded with nuggets of pancetta.

La Morra's primi (pastas) included gnocchi with Gorgonzola cheese and radicchio Trevisano ($9), named after a city in the orbit of Venice. The incomparable, velvety texture of these potato pillows, combined with the restrained assertiveness of Italy's distinctive, creamy blue cheese, made a marvelous combination, and even the slightly charred accompanying radicchio did not diminish my enjoyment of the dish. Saffron risotto with braised veal shanks ($10) included shards of tender, succulent veal of the richest flavor, while the risotto was at once firm to the bite and creamy, showcasing the particular quality of arborio rice that makes it so well suited to risotto. Most memorable among the pastas, the fettucelle con cerveliti ($10) brought a superb housemade fettuccini, cooked to al dente perfection, dressed in a toothsome sauce of sweetbreads, veal cheeks and chestnuts that almost begged to be mopped up with La Morra's estimable house-baked Tuscan bread.

The secondi, or main courses, at La Morra included brasato con polenta ($19.95), which the menu translated as braised short ribs with tomato and radicchio. The translator omitted mention of the wonderfully creamy polenta that accompanied this meaty, robustly beefy preparation and rendered the ensemble a thoroughly satisfying, not to mention filling, dish. Monkfish con finocchio e pancetta ($18.95) combined firm-fleshed fish with tender, braised fennel, again enlivened with more of the delicious smoky-salty pancetta.

Less successful was the lamb polpettone ($17.95), a giant meatball that dominated the plate like a boulder. Both its unseemly presentation and slightly dry texture detracted from its skillfully herbed flavor, but the well-constructed tomato-and-wine sauce and a garnish of roasted leeks—one of my favorite vegetables, which I don't see on menus often enough—rescued the dish. Not so fortunate was the spit-roasted porchetta ($17.95), a thick slice of smoked pork shoulder that arrived buried under an unpleasant, almost acrid sauce of pureed parsley. The dish was so removed from the general high standard set by La Morra's cuisine that I thought it might have been snuck in from the outside by a desperate competitor. The last main course I tried, galletto alla griglia con rapini ($17.95), raised roast chicken to a new height, with crisp, pleasantly salty skin encasing its moist, full-flavored flesh. Only the accompanying tangle of tough, stemmy broccoli rabe missed its mark.

Dolce (desserts) included a creamy, mellowly sweet honey panna cotta ($8.25), served in a tortilla-shaped cookie and garnished with refreshingly sweet-tart raspberries, strawberries and blackberries. For the "if it ain't chocolate, it ain't dessert" crowd, the flourless chocolate cake ($8.25)

Woodgrilled whole shapper with soffrito and pea fregola

La Morra occupies a cozy space on the edge of Brookline Village.

La Morra chef/owner Josh Ziskin honed his skills in his restaurant's namesake village in Italy.

Semolina gnocchi with spring vegetables turned out to be an imposing cylinder of very rich, fudgy chocolate mousse with even darker chocolate coating.

As befits a restaurant named for a wine town, La Morra has a substantial list of almost 50 wines, all from northern Italy (save one French selection, an Alsatian riesling). The consumer-friendly prices range from $15, for an excellent, well-balanced half-liter carafe of Italian merlot, to a handful of bottles below $30, on up to $100 and beyond for the most noble of Italy's red wines, Barolo and Barbaresco, from Ziskin's beloved Piemonte. I found the 2001 San Fabiano Chianti Putto ($24), a blend of sangiovese, trebbiano and malvasia nera, thin and uninteresting, making the carafe of Italian merlot the much better value. Observing other diners who ordered wine by the glass, I noted generous pours that looked to be a full six ounces, a welcome departure from the skimpy glasses that prevail at all too many Boston restaurants.

La Morra is located in the most improbable of sites, a small, two-story building on the south side of Route 9, just beyond the end of Harvard Street, on the fringe of Brookline Village. Diners with reservations are generally seated upstairs, with walk-ins on the first floor. Up and down, the space is warm, cozy and pleasantly appointed, with a stone and mortar wall along the staircase, lots of exposed brick, and curved wrought iron bars supporting small spotlights that illuminate the engaging, framed Italian poster advertisements on the walls.

The servers at La Morra provide attentive, informed and gracious hospitality, doing justice to Ziskin's superb culinary handiwork. Not only does the food taste good, but picture-perfect presentation graces almost everything that leaves the kitchen, with pastas served in oversized white bowls, and antipasti and secondi carefully arranged on plates to please the eye as well as the palate.

La Morra's reasonable prices are made even more so by a fixed-price menu available, at least at this writing, on both weekdays and weekends. At $35 for four courses—appetizer, pasta, main course and dessert—this menu has to be one of the premier dining bargains of the entire Boston area. Brookline has a number of restaurants where prices are fair and portions generous, but none that I know of combine such value with the kind of first-rate, creatively conceived and professionally executed cuisine that Ziskin presents at La Morra. This Could Be His Year

Fournier leads off new lineup… Steve Johnson as free agent…

BY CAROLYN FAYE FOX

Jeffrey P. Fournier is ready for his close-up.

"I've been the small name behind he big people for a long time," says 'ournier, who spent most of the past even years working for Lydia Shire t Pignoli, Biba, Locke-Ober and ıost recently at Excelsior, where he ⁄as sous chef before being tapped as he new executive chef at Sophia's.

Sophia's? The dance club near Fen-⁄ay Park? "That's a Latin club that's alling apart," says Fournier of his first ıpression of his new venue, just five ıonths ago. Not anymore. Fournier ıas overseen a major makeover. He ainted the downstairs dining room ımself, choosing a vivid palette of eds, yellows, oranges—"Latin colors," e says. He furnished it with new hairs, custom-designed wine racks and n elegant chef's table for 10 whose ark wood contrasts dramatically with right yellow chairs and orange charg-rs. Then the multitalented Fournier, a ainter in the artistic sense of the word, ung his own paintings on the walls.

New executive chef Jeffrey Fournier has re-vamped the menu and decor at Sophia's.

Most important, he's created a seasonal ıenu of small plates ("not tapas," he in-ists) mostly inspired by Central and South ımerican cuisiness and crafted with rench technique.

"When people come in, they're blown way," he says proudly. Fournier's three-art menu begins with a list of homemade ıfused liquors paired with tiny tastes: dark piced rum with sugar cane–skewered ırimp, or chamomile liqueur with truffled gg and herb crostini, for example. Next re "mini-plates," all priced at $5 or less, uch as crispy chorizo with roasted garlic uree and arepas con queso with mango utter. Finally, the "small plates," which ournier describes as one-third the size of a ypical main course, include selections uch as tuna ceviche with taro root chips nd spiced salt, and pan-seared snapper ⁄ith Peruvian skordalia and scallion vinai-rette. The most expensive item—charred kirt steak served with "all-night roasted ɔmatoes," pickled egg and saffron rice—is ıst $13. That's about what you'd spend for Fenway Frank and a beer right around he corner.

SECOND COURSE

Congratulations to the four Boston-area ecipients of the 2005 DiRoNA awards: Lumiere, in West Newton, and the Federalist, No. 9 Park, and Radius, all downtown. The prestigious honor is bestowed only after a restaurant passes an anonymous, independent 75-point inspection that reviews the totality of the dining experience, from arranging a reservation to receiving the check. DiRoNA stands for Distinguished Restaurants of North America, and is not to be confused with dirona, which is a genus of sea slug.

What's Steve Johnson been up to since he left the Blue Room and embarked on a search for a new restaurant space in Cambridge? "Still looking, and boy have I been looking!" he says. "I am one of the most educated restaurant real estate people out there these days." Johnson is also enjoying what he calls "semi-retirement," but he'll be back in the kitchen come Memorial Day weekend. "This summer, since I don't have anything really cooking for a restaurant yet, I will be running what they call the Way Back Eddy—the eat-in or take-out chicken and ribs joint across from the Back Eddy," says Johnson. "Basically, it's a well-contrived excuse for me to spend another summer on the river down in Westport, heh heh." IB

Washington Stars

BY SANDY BLOCK MW

You look at a map and wonder, How can they make wine all the way up there? And doesn't it always rain in Washington state anyway? Well, not exactly. In fact, the first time I went to the Pacific Northwest wine country I was bowled over by how hot, sunny and desertlike Washington's weather was in the summer. The vineyards rest between two mountain ranges that effectively block out passage of low-lying rain clouds and ocean breezes for much of the year. In fact, even though the weather in Seattle's always overcast, the eastern side of the Cascade Mountains is so dry that the vines actually have to be irrigated for the grapes to ripen.

Although the state produces more fine wine than any other outside of California, we don't hear a lot about Washington. Being second is fine, but when number one is literally 10 times larger, it's not much of a distinction. Yet, unlike California, with its vast oceans of blended jug wine, Washington makes only so-called premium varietal wines. Even though it's very hot during the daytime and the sun stays out an average of two hours longer per day than in California's key growing regions, eastern Washington's nighttime temperatures can plunge 40 degrees, preserving freshness and balance in the flavors of the most highly regarded grape varieties. So the wines that result taste ripe and juicy, but they're also understated. The style is closer to classical European than California. And, best of all, prices tend to be moderate.

The industry is very young, having only gotten launched in any significant sense in the early 1980s. In fact, despite still being smaller in aggregate than Napa Valley, Washington's vineyard acreage has nearly tripled in the past 10 years and keeps growing. The number of wineries has tripled in the last seven years. Most are tiny, and a great majority of the grape growers who supply them also farm other agricultural crops, like mint, hops, apples, onions and potatoes. This is a totally different scene than northern California; there's a sincere spirit of cooperation among the producers in helping to promote each other's wines that's as surprising as it is refreshing.

Whereas initially Washington state produced a preponderance of white grapes, particularly cool-climate varietals like riesling and chardonnay, today red grapes account for almost 60 percent. And if one grape has waved the banner for Washington's reputation internationally, it's merlot. But most of what you'll taste is not light, sweet or candy-like. Washington merlots tend to be darker, more intensely spicy, sharper in flavor and somewhat "dustier" than average.

Cabernet sauvignon is close to merlot in total production and tends to be somewhat more understated in flavor than comparable wines from California. But the newest star has been syrah, a virtual nonentity 10 years ago; new vineyard acreage has been growing at the fastest rate of any grape in the state. Washington syrah is not Australian in inspiration or style; most of the producers are following the French model, with earthier, somewhat vegetal flavor accents to the omnipresent raspberry notes the norm.

Chardonnay, it's no surprise, is the dominant white grape, and in Washington it tends to be more delicate, with crisper, leaner fruit flavors, than elsewhere. Many of the wines you'll taste are minimally oaky, if at all. Riesling acreage has been declining to the point where there is now a shortage, and demand is very strong as there has been something of a riesling renaissance going on nationally. Washington's predominant riesling style seems to have settled in as sweet and fruity, in the Germanic mode, rather than bone dry, as in Alsace. As the Germans have recently begun to produce more and more dry riesling, and consumers who once looked to the Mosel and Rhine as their primary sources for sweeter white wine are sometimes disappointed, Washington riesling has become one of the primary options. Northwest rieslings tend to be fuller in body and have less acidity, with riper, more developed, almost tropical fruit flavors; they have also generally been bargain priced. For fans of dessert wine, Washington doesn't tend to get much noble rot (the mold that gives grapes dessert-wine sweetness). But there are ice wines, rich, luscious and generally a quarter the price you'd pay for a German variety.

Finally, Gewurztraminer, another classic Germanic grape, is also among the more popular choices, and again, as with Riesling, the wines tend to be sweeter rather than bone dry. It produces a florally scented, spicy wine that has attained classic status paired with many Asian cuisines. IB

Kendrick Oliver performs at Beyond Shelter

CityScope: Beyond Lansdowne

When we think of Avalon, we think of flashing lights, rock shows, drag queens and, mainly, young clubbers waving stamped hands in time to the pulsating music. While that's what you'll typically find Thursday though Sunday nights at the Lansdowne Street hot spot, the atmosphere will be decidedly more decorous for the 17th annual Beyond Shelter event, April 28. That night, Avalon trades in its edgy M.O. for a night of dignitaries, celebrities, gourmet food and, if you can believe it, big-band jazz, at the IMPROPER-sponsored benefit for Friends of Boston's Homeless. Kendrick Oliver & the New Life Jazz Orchestra provide the tunes, 25 local restaurants including Hamersley's Bistro, Icarus, Jasper White's Summer Shack and Le Soir provide the eats, and cool prizes like a trip to NYC and a stay at the Four Seasons Hotel Boston are up for grabs in a raffle. Not a bad way to spend $50. 6-11 pm. $50. 15 Lansdowne St., Boston (617-534-2526 ext. 383). www.fobh.org.

CityScope: The Art of Chocolate

Imagine an art gallery opening, but instead of walking around looking at paintings and photographs, you look at chocolate—and eat it too. Local chocoholic Dana Zemack, chocolate maker and host of Cambridge Community Television's cooking program, The Tasty Show, is throwing a combination tasting party and chocolate sculpture show at Inman Square's Zeitgeist Gallery. For the party, Zemack is calling on her experience teaching classes in "chocolate crafting" and chocolate tasting at the Cambridge Center for Adult Education. As you stroll through the gallery, you can sample truffles, chocolate candies and chocolate-dipped fruit made by Zemack and admire the chocolate-work. You'll find old favorites—white chocolate raspberry, dark chocolate Grand Marnier—and some new flavor combos. Zemack says she's considering Baileys, root beer, pear liqueur and champagne as truffle flavors. "I'm also experimenting with interesting spices—pink peppercorn, fleur de sel, cardamom—so that people will have something a little out of the ordinary to taste," she says. Zeitgeist Gallery, 1353 Cambridge St., Cambridge (617-876-6060). 7-9 pm. www.thetastyshow.com. $10 suggested donation.

THU./APRIL 29

Tastings: Art Thou Hungry?

If you've passed within a three block radius of Shreve, Crump & Low in the past few weeks, you've probably noticed the loud, orange and green sign that reads "Edible Art 2004" hanging from the jewelry titan's slick exterior. For Arlington and Boylston Street regulars, the sign may have triggered flashbacks of similar banners announcing "Edible Art 2003 [2002, 2001, etc]." Now in its 11th year, the evening of edible interpretations of famous art works, which benefits the Art Institute of Boston's student scholarship programs, has become a springtime tradition. Chefs from 29 Newbury, Azure, Bonfire, Jer-Ne, Mistral, Radius and more take their culinary creativity to another level and whip up tasty renditions of fine art that are actually served to attendees. Last year's event saw a chocolate version of Dali's melting clocks by Meritage pastry chef Lori Prescott. (It must have been at least a little painful for her to see all that hard work gobbled up before her eyes.) In addition to lots of food and drink, there's also a silent auction—items include original works by Art Institute students as well as restaurant gift certificates. 6 pm. $150. 330 Boylston St., Boston (617-267-8862). www.aiboston.edu/edibleart.

Mr. Lif

Music: Back on the Map

Some of the best recent moments in Boston hip-hop have come from the stellar duo of Mr. Lif and Akrobatik, who wrap up a six-week tour at the Middle East May 1. Watching these longtime friends and veterans of the Boston hip-hop scene perform together on stage is sort of like watching the Death Star get destroyed over and over and over. Their unique combination of bombast and subtlety makes you wish the set would never end. The duo's long-awaited debut album as the Perceptionists (with producer DJ Fakts One) is sure to be an aural Molotov cocktail if the pair's recent solo endeavors are any indication. Akrobatik's Balance (2003) was sharp, urgent and so positive that you felt like a better person just by listening to it. The Def Jux III tour is bound to pack the house, since it features not only Ak, Lif and Fakts One performing as the Perceptionists, but also fellow favorites from the Definitive Jux label C-Rayz Walz, Murs, Hangar 18 and S.A. Smash, as well as newcomer 4th Pyramid. So get there early or be prepared to lie to your friends the next day. Middle East Downstairs, 472 Mass. Ave., Cambridge (617-492-9181). $15. 18+

CityScope: May Day

John Higby, aka the Yo-Yo Guy

It's official. Spring has sprung and warm (-ish) weather is here. While the college girls celebrate by parading around in micro-mini skirts, flip flops and skimpy tank tops, Harvard Square gets in the groove with its 21st Annual MayFair. Agoraphobics beware: More than 100,000 people are expected to fill the six block area surrounding the square as it transforms into an international marketplace/street performance arena for the afternoon. Vendors hawk handmade jewelry, antiques and vintage goods at the sidewalk sale, while buskers, including acrobatic comedy duo the Daredevil Chicken Club and John Higby, aka the Yo-Yo Guy, entertain the crowd. Highlights this year include a free concert by Berklee alumni on Brattle Street, Mary Poppins–style sidewalk chalk sketches at the Italian Street Painting Festival and, for those with 10 inches of hair to spare, spring shearing for Locks of Love at the Dare to Be Bare Diego Salon Charity Cut and Buzz-a-Thon. If that's not enough to pique your interest, we hear there are some free food samples too. 12-6 pm. Free. Harvard Square, Cambridge (617-491-3434). www.harvardsquare.com.

Deja Vu

Kill Bill Vol. 2 is another derivative disappointment

BY PAUL SHERMAN

Welcome to another episode of Quentin Tarantino's I Love the '70s!—er, I mean Kill Bill Vol. 2. Uma Thurman's sword-wielding "the Bride" is back for more mayhem, having already polished off two of the paid assassins she used to work with, in Vol. 1. Understandably steamed that her fellow hitmen left her and her unborn baby for dead at her El Paso wedding, under the orders of their elusive boss, Bill (David Carradine), the beaten and bloodied Bride is ready to spare no hardship to knock off fellow killers Elle Driver (Daryl Hannah) and Budd (Michael Madsen) and then set her sights on Bill.

In other words, the four-hour-plus (in its entirety) tale is a simple revenge story. As is the case with most movies, there have been plenty of similar tales told onscreen. So it's not necessarily what's getting told as much as how it's being told that determines whether all this is worth sitting through or caring about. Unfortunately, though, nearly all Tarantino does—or seems interested in doing—is lift elements from other movies, clumsily paying homage to genre films of decades past and treating violence like a glib joke.

In Kill Bill Vol. 2, the Bride (Uma Thurman) continues her pursuit of Bill (David Carradine)

Ultimately, it's just plain pathetic to see Tarantino do this. Imagine a popular band that's releasing its first CD in six years (the time gap between Tarantino's Jackie Brown and the first Kill Bill), and all they can muster is an album of cover versions of songs others originated. A double album of covers, in this case. That's not a signal of much creativity.

Kill Bill Vol. 2 doesn't start with the same desperate cramming of 1970s references that began Vol. 1. But the hope that Tarantino might do away with the pop-culture camouflage and let his characters and his dialogue do the work never becomes reality. There's one sequence that crackles with unforced intensity, when Budd gets systematically chewed out by his boss (Larry Bishop) at the strip club where he's a bouncer. As in Vol. 1's sequence when the Bride visits swordsmith Hattori Hanzo (Sonny Chiba) and convinces him to come out of retirement to make her a sword, it actually feels like two people are interacting. In general, having Madsen around helps Vol. 2. The Reservoir Dogs vet is the only star here who seems genuinely dangerous and doesn't feel like a mere actor playing bad-ass.

But, not surprisingly, Vol. 2 is just more of the same stuff found in Vol. 1. Tarantino mainly clings to the style of 1960s spaghetti westerns and 1970s kung fu movies this time. Many of the scenes featuring Budd, especially those set around his trailer in the desert, favor the extreme close-ups of Sergio Leone's "Man with No Name" westerns, with the soundtrack even lifting Ennio Morricone's music from one of those movies (when the score isn't merely imitating it). And one of the flashbacks to the relationship between the Bride and Bill, in which he places her under the tutelage of a wise kung fu master (Gordon Liu), is shot to look exactly like a grainy 1970s Hong Kong action picture.

Both the spaghetti western and kung fu homages are mildly amusing (Liu is fun as a cranky mentor), but why does all this feel like the slickest, biggest-budgeted student film ever made? Tarantino was one of the first Americans to show a Hong Kong action influence in his films, but that was a decade ago; it's not special anymore. And Tarantino isn't just trying to do a 1970s goof, like Starsky & Hutch or The Brady Bunch Movie (for one, his movie isn't nearly as funny as those).

Instead, he's built both Kill Bill movies around the complex relationship between their heroine and the title character. But Vol. 2, in which we really experience Bill for the first time, does little to convey the bond between Bill and the Bride, save for some unconvincing flashbacks in which she is supposed to be a gangly, giggly, 20-ish girl who for some reason looks up to him. Damned if I know why. The casting of Carradine does not yield the same treasures as Tarantino's other reclamation projects (John Travolta in Pulp Fiction, Pam Grier in Jackie Brown), and instead of a man the Bride will kill for and fall for, Bill just seems like an old windbag who spins lame philosophical tales.

Since the whole movie—make that two movies—hinges upon the shared emotional history of Bill and the Bride, which turns out to run deeper than even she realizes, that's important stuff. But the failure of Bill as a character is more Tarantino's fault than Carradine's (though I'd like to have seen Paul Newman in the role). Also Tarantino's fault is the jokey level of the violence, which doesn't have the first movie's geysers of blood but does often treat violent fatal blows like ha-ha punchlines. It was truly bold of Tarantino to keep Jackie Brown free of any tongue-in-cheek air. Now, tongue-in-cheek glibness is all Tarantino has. That's a lowdown dirty shame. IB

Kill Bill Vol. 2 ★★

Connie and Carla ★★★
Nia Vardalos returns to the big screen with a riff o Billy Wilder's Some Like It Hot that you might call M Big Fat Drag Queen Wig. Vardalos (who wrote th script) and Toni Collette play Chicago lounge singe who witness a crime boss murdering an underlin The hunted women flee to West Hollywood, whe they end up impersonating drag queens in orden find work in a cabaret. Vardalos and Collette bo have a sunny kookiness that gets the comedy over dependence on stereotypes (there's little varie among the overemotional gay men they meet). A while it may be easy to dismiss the passé "gays are pe ple too" sentiment, following the debate over marriage the sentiment seems pretty timely, after a (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind ★★
The latest mindbender written by Charlie Kau man (Being John Malkovich, Human Nature, Ada tation) is, as always, like an M.C. Escher drawi in which you can't always tell which directi things are headed in, but you put your faith in th hope that Kaufman will still get his characters an interesting place. This time, the story about couple (Jim Carrey, Kate Winslet) who've h their memories wiped of a fizzled relationship b try to rekindle their romantic spark fails to rewa that faith. Kaufman bats around interesting ide about the struggle between science and huma urges, but despite the appealing chemistry b tween the stars, the ride isn't nearly as involvin amusing, layered or cohesive as the metaphysic journeys in Malkovich or Adaptation. (At Bosto Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Girl Next Door ★★
Emile Hirsch plays the teen Everyboy well, Elis Cuthbert is whistle-worthy and Timothy Olypha shows more life than he ever has before. Still, this a merely decent (and flagrant) Risky Business knoc off, with the aforementioned trio in the respecti Tom Cruise, Rebecca DeMornay and Joe Pantolia roles. Hirsch plays a smart senior; the naughty ba he fancies (Cuthbert) is a porn star trying to get o of the business and Olyphant plays her boss, w wants her horizontal on the set again. It's not t easy to connect the knockoff's dots but, to its cred the film remains watchable. (At Boston Commo Fenway and suburbs.)

Good Bye Lenin! ★★½
An East German woman goes into a coma just b fore the Berlin Wall falls, and when she has to le a stress-free life after she comes to, her son goes great lengths to make sure she never learns that h Communist country doesn't exist anymore. Th great premise yields some amusing moments, b also some disappointing ones. Unlike in Bil Wilder's brilliant One, Two, Three (which cover similar territory after the wall went up), the come here never quite hits high gear because the sto tempers that comedy with shades of drama. But t characters' family drama never becomes as mem rable as the premise. (At Kendall Square.)

Hellboy ★★
Can't quite see what all the fuss is about over th comic book adaptation. The title character is inde a boy from hell who was found when Allied forc thwarted a Nazi attempt to open the portal to h and unleash demons. It has great visuals and a f lead performance from Ron Perlman, who plays t grown-up "H.B.," who now helps the U.S. gover ment fight off the same sort of paranormal demo whenever they intrude on our world. But the fil comprises a set of very familiar genre elements: a f ther-son relationship (with John Hurt's scientist a surrogate dad), a lovelorn hero (he pines for Seli Blair's firestarter, another demon-fighter for the go ernment) and convenient yet not-too-interesti villains (this time, it's Rasputin and Nazis). A even in a fantasy context, the notion that the Na got power from the occult, and not from huma doing inhuman things, is borderline offensive. (Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Hidalgo ★★★
It's not the most ambitious movie, but this 1890 adventure earns a lot of goodwill for its old-schi desire to please the average moviegoer, and not jus narrow demographic segment. This tale of an Ame can Pony Express rider who enters a prestigious lon distance horse race in the Arabian Peninsula wi his trusty mustang is a small breath of fresh air. W an unassuming and appealing Viggo Mortensen as hero, the movie packs in the Saturday-matinee e otic entertainment of The Scorpion King, though doesn't shoot for humor as often. And it convey bond between man and horse better than the heavy-handed Seabiscuit did. Although based on a true story, the desert adventure should be taken with a big grain of salt, since it turns out hero Frank T. Hopkins may have told a tall tale or two in his day. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Intermission ★★★
Think of it as an Irish version of Scotland's Trainspotting. Sex, drugs and rockin' crime are the main sparks to this comedy, which lights on fire when one foolish Dubliner (Cillian Murphy of 28 Days Later) dumps his dishy girlfriend (Kelly Macdonald of Trainspotting) "as a test," and she promptly hooks up with a married man (Michael McElhatton). This dubious act causes a ripple effect that spills into the lives of the married man's wife (Deirdre O'Kane), a surly bus driver (Brian F. O'Byrne), a macho cop dying to be a celebrity (Colm Meaney) and even an out-of-control thief (Colin Farrell). The movie is never as wild again as in its opening scene, so there's a steady petering, but the dark comedy usually connects, and it never totally runs out of momentum. (At Copley Place, Harvard Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Jersey Girl ★★
Ben Affleck turns in a strong performance as a Manhattan publicist whose wife dies in childbirth, and who soon thereafter loses his job for badmouthing a client and ends up back at his dad's home in New Jersey. Affleck and Raquel Castro, as his daughter, have a playful chemistry, and the performances make up for some of the weaknesses in writer-director Kevin Smith's script. But despite oddly appealing touches, (Affleck, Liv Tyler and Castro sing a song from Sweeney Todd at the girl's school variety show), the action often defaults to the most generic touches, like including bland Fleetwood Mac or Springsteen songs at "emotional" moments. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Johnson Family Vacation ★★
More power to Cedric the Entertainer, who headlines his first comedy here. But this knockoff of National Lampoon's Vacation—this time about a black Los Angeles family struggling to make it to a Missouri family reunion—strains to generate laughs. The only sustained amusement comes in the two stretches when Cedric and his fellow Original Kings of Comedy vet Steve Harvey face off as two grown brothers who are still as competitive (and childish) as they were at age 10. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The Ladykillers ★★★
The Coen brothers' latest is as much a companion piece to their O Brother, Where Art Thou? as it is to the Alec Guinness English comedy it remakes. In transplanting to the Deep South the tale of robbers masquerading as musicians, the Coens have given it some of the down-home feel of O Brother, using gospel music here as they did bluegrass in that film. Tom Hanks, who plays more of a character role as a highfalutin' Southern intellectual trying to rob a casino, isn't George Clooney funny here, but the irrepressible Irma P. Hall, as the God-fearing landlady who finds out what the Poe-quoting intellectual is up to, just about makes up for it. (At Loews Boston Common, AMC Fenway and suburbs.)

Mean Girls ★★
With a comic tone pitched somewhere between Heathers and Clueless, writer and co-star Tina (Saturday Night Live) Fey's comedy comes off like a watered-down version of both—not as savage as the first nor as stylized as the second. Perhaps the problem was shoehorning the story to appeal to the preteen audience of star Lindsay Lohan. She plays a 16-year-old who's been living in Africa with her zoologist parents and is now entering a conventional high school for the first time. She gets taken under the wing of the school's popular girls, and soon becomes consumed by the vain, territorial teen princesses' wicked ways. While respectable (and respectful of its audience), Fey's anti-gossip, pro-sisterhood tale is long-winded and not all that funny. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

The United States of Leland ★★

Walking Tall ★★
The Rock convincingly stands up and fights, but it's not surprising to learn that this "whack first, ask questions later" action movie is totally generic. After all, it remakes the much-sequelized 1973 original, yet changes the hero from the real-life Buford Pusser to the fictional Chris Vaughn, a soldier who returns to his Pacific Northwest hometown to find it overrun with crime. The hero's vigilante streak doesn't make my fist pump in the air, and maybe if the bad guys and the fight scenes had less slickness and more realism, this might have come across better. The Rock may be smart and likable, but his latest isn't. (At Boston Common, Fenway and suburbs.)

Independents Days

Is That a Zombie? No, It's Steven Tyler

Indie film buffs, get ready: Both the Boston Independent Film Festival and the Underground Film Festival are in town over the next two weeks.

The Independent Film Society of Boston's second annual Independent Film Festival showcases a variety of features, documentaries and short films, as well as musicians and artists. Joanna Horn, the festival's media director, characterizes it as an "event and venue for the filmmakers to mingle with each other," through question-and-answer sessions, panel discussions and nightly after-parties. About 50 visiting filmmakers will attend and screen their work. "We're taking a lot of films, most of which don't have distribution yet, and providing the access and the venue for both the filmmaker and the audience," says Horn. Highlights include Curtiss Clayton's Rick, starring Bill Pullman, which opens the festival. Festival-goers can also see the world premiere of Tufts alumnus Dennis Brooks' Goodnight, Joseph Parker, in which Aerosmith's Steven Tyler makes his acting debut as a New Jersey barfly.

Double Dare at the IFF

Headlining the Boston Underground Film Festival this year are two classics, Knightriders and Night of the Living Dead, by horror film icon George A. Romero—who'll attend screenings and Q&As. "This is the most above-ground edition I've ever done," says David Klieler, who founded the festival in 1997 after a few years of hosting screenings of independent and controversial films at the Coolidge Corner Theatre and the Revolving Museum. This year's festival boasts a zombie motif and includes "a stronger emphasis on music," says Klieler—local musicians the Bentmen give a zombie-themed performance, and a trailer for an upcoming documentary on Boston band Mission of Burma is on the schedule. Klieler characterizes his festival as being "more politically controversial," with edgier material than other film festivals. Also on the schedule: a variety of short films, including a collection from Canada, and the New England premiere of Dear Pillow, written and directed by Brian Poyser.

The Raveonettes put Denmark on the rock 'n' roll map with style and concept

BY PAUL ROBICHEAU

Some bands get evasive or uptight when talk turns to their influences. That's not the case with the Raveonettes, the distinctively derivative Danish duo who copped their name from the Buddy Holly song "Rave On" and '60s girl groups like the Ronettes.

"We're very proud of all the references in our music, and it's very deliberate," says bassist Sharin Foo. "It's almost like an homage to all the great music that we're inspired by."

In addition to Buddy Holly and '60s girl groups wrapped in Spector's wall of sound, the Raveonettes reflect the noise and dissonance of the Jesus and Mary Chain, Sonic Youth and Suicide, along with the primal beat of the Cramps. There are touches of Hank Williams and surf rock. And the vocal harmonies of Foo and guitarist-songwriter Sune Rose Wagner echo the Beach Boys, Blondie and primary inspiration the Everly Brothers.

"When we started working together, it came amazingly easy to us to sing together," Foo, 28, says of her musical (never romantic) relationship with the year-younger Wagner. "We like the tension and perspective it adds that the vocals are very subtle and sweet, and then there's the music that complements it, but it's completely different and very aggressive."

That aggressive side was stressed in the relentless drone of the Raveonettes' 2002 EP, Whip It On, recorded entirely in the dark key of B-flat minor. The vocals are more fleshed out on Chain Gang of Love, the band's first full-length (which clocks in at a still-brief 33 minutes). The lineup on the newer disc includes guitarist Manoj Ramdas and drummer Jacob Hoyer, who first joined to augment the group's live sound. The critically acclaimed release also switches the key exclusively to the more accessible B-flat major.

In addition to limiting their choice of musical keys, the Raveonettes generally stick to three chords and three-minute lengths in their songs, evoking the minimalist aesthetics of Danish filmmaker Lars Van Trier. "We set up these guidelines," Foo says. "One thing was to not have any hi-hat and ride cymbal on the album. We do have lots of high-end sounds coming from all kinds of weird things, like metal and chains and whips. It's difficult to decipher, and we have little things in there that I'm not supposed to tell you about, like (film soundtrack) samples."

All those elements should be in the mix when the Raveonettes return to the Paradise May 9. The statuesque bassist mentions that her group supplements its onstage sound with prerecorded tracks—again speaking openly on a topic that's touchy for some bands.

"That is a big part of our music," she says from Los Angeles. "Chain Gang of Love has a laid-back feel, and when we play live, it becomes more aggressive and in-your-face. But we try and translate the same sound from the album to the live experience."

"A Raveonettes live experience is a little strange because the songs are so short," Foo adds of her group's roughly hour-long sets. "We like to keep it short because it's a lot for people to digest. It really is quite intense."

Despite the band's strict ways, she says, "We're definitely loosening up. We're working on material for a new album now and the songs are in various different keys. We've moved away from B flat, so we can go completely crazy on this next album. But the Raveonettes sound will always have that minimalistic approach."

That approach complements the duo's visual style, which shows a penchant for film noir and Jack Kerouac (whose face is tattooed on Wagner's arm), and continues a fascination with Americana.

"Our music has a really American flavor, which is kind of confusing for people," Foo says, "but it has that little twist to it which is very European and Scandinavian.

"We're definitely the first Danish band that ever played on a show like David Letterman," she says. "Denmark hasn't been able to break into international rock. The Swedes have done better. The Danish culture and mentality is very much about having a good lifestyle, and there's a lack of self-confidence. There's also a tendency for Danish bands to merely copy what's doing well in the U.S. and U.K., but now I think that's changing."

As for comparisons with American outfits like the White Stripes or the Raveonettes' recent tourmates the Strokes, Foo says, "We're a movement of bands that wanted to go back to 'less is more' and not so much of an overproduced, pretentious thing. But when people say, 'Do you feel like you're part of the garage movement?' There's no way we sound like a garage band."

"We definitely have pretension too, in many ways," she admits. "It's all icing on the cake really. Of course you need substance, but it's a balance. I love that tongue-in-cheek thing." iB

Death to George

The following is an editorial from "the Committee to Bring Back the Rattlesnake Bar"

One year ago the "Rattlesnake Bar and Grill" the most exciting and fun bar and in the Back Bay was changed to George: An American Tavern. This was not due to change in ownership, but rather from the idiocy and misguidance of one of the owners. A man named Gordon Wilcox who felt he was a visionary in the restaurant field. His ideas, however proved to be as outdated as the powder blue, double knit tuxedo that he wore to Spinazzola last month and about as sharp as the 1½ star chef that he hired to create the menu. The result was a place as boring as Mr. Wilcox's personal life.

Convinced to seek therapy, Mr. Wilcox has been shipped off to Saratoga, N.Y. to watch the horseys run round and round leaving his partners to make appropriate changes and to apologize to all the loyal customers they have had over the years.

Effective mid-April, the new and improved Rattlesnake Bar opens and promises good times to all, featuring: exotic drinks, a rooftop bar, Budweiser, a private room and a menu created by Chris Schlesinger and his chefs at the East Coast Grill.

They hope to see you this spring.

Wayne's World

Longtime cult favorites Fountains of Wayne come to Boston on the heels of their pop breakthrough Fountains of Wayne perform at Avalon May 6.

It's on the tip of your tongue, stuck in your mind. You can't fight it. It's pop music, infectious and danceable. Just submit.

Fountains of Wayne perfected the three-and-a-half minute pop ditty with last summer's top-40 hit "Stacey's Mom," from the band's third album, Welcome Interstate Managers. Love it or (more likely) hate it, you can't keep from humming or—gasp—singing if it comes on the radio. The playful tale of adolescent hormones has primed Fountains of Wayne for the commercial success that evaded the band with its first two albums. And the tongue-in-cheek, new wavy video was a hit too—with its gratuitous cleavage shots of Rachel Hunter, and the band superimposed on magazine covers, swathed in day-glo purple that might have been inspired by their producer, Ric Ocasek, formerly of the Cars.

So are the guys worried about being typecast as a novelty band?

"There's definitely that fear," admits singer/guitarist Chris Collingwood over the phone. "But I haven't changed. It's not like billions of dollars are pouring in. We're working unbelievably hard."

Fountains of Wayne have indeed been busy: touring, promoting Welcome Interstate Managers since its release in June 2003 and rubbing elbows with other artists at the Grammy Awards in February. The band earned two nominations—Best New Artist and Best Pop Performance by a Duo or Group—but went home empty-handed.

"The actual ceremony itself isn't a good time," Collingwood says. "It's like five or six hours long with no food. We were starving and there wasn't even a candy bar machine."

Somehow it makes sense that the writers of "Stacy's Mom" would be more concerned about snacks than awards. Fountains of Wayne enjoy an easy pop craft—the sonically pleasing songs on Welcome Interstate Managers, about such topics as disgruntled waitresses and dead-end jobs, seem effortless. Collingwood and Fountains bassist Adam Schlesinger split the writing duties, although the two now live in different cities. (Collingwood recently moved away from New York City and his bandmates to live in Northampton with his wife and cat.)

"Adam and I had only one discussion before making the album, and we decided that it wouldn't have a concept," Collingwood notes. "I hate to even draw comparisons, but our model was the White Album, which doesn't make sense on a whole, yet each song is individually great."

The band's song of the moment is still "Stacy's Mom" (a new single, "Mexican Wine," is slowly gaining radio play). But teeny-bopper fans expecting a glitz-and-glam pop spectacle à la Britney might be disappointed by the Fountains' upcoming show at Avalon on May 6, which features an acoustic opening set from Evan Dando.

"Our show is our show," Collingwood says. "We've been touring extensively for years; we just aren't elaborate or theatrical."

No fireworks?

"We wanted some naked midgets on a conveyor belt, but I think Blink 182 covered that already," he adds, laughing.
